Still, this is the impasse at which we have arrived by using as a standard and a sole measure a metal which is not to be found in sufficient quantities to satisfy all the demand for it, and, secondly, which has been cornered by two countries.

Everybody seems to be at their wits' end how to end this crisis, but the most obvious way—that is, to make the world independent of gold—seems not to be considered seriously by many. Still, that is the only possible way unless gold should be found in very much larger quantities in some place or other in the world.

That there are some countries who, having all the gold they want and more, would be against creating a necessary competitor of gold as a standard, is natural, but it is unnatural that other countries would be willing to strengthen this impossible dictatorship of gold still further.

A VICIOUS CIRCLE

If we give the matter careful thought and use a little bit of imagination we should find that if this present position goes on unchecked, prices of all commodities will become still lower and lower, consumers getting poorer and poorer, thus being starved of even buying sufficiently of these commodities, and all that would be left in the world would be "gold", in some cold, deep cellars, invisible even to the world. Even now there are egotists who propose destroying wheat and cotton; if they would propose to do away with gold (a useless article for consumption) they would show more wisdom.

The world's progress demands that the dictatorship of gold be abolished in the shortest possible time. Surely, as confidence in the production of all commodities gets more and more shaken by their fall in prices, the bulk of gold must go on increasing in the cellars where there is such an abundance of it already. Is this progress? It may be the ideal of the miser, but it cannot be the ideal of the workers of the world.

During the war we had not only wheat as the sole food reserve of the country; we had stand-bys in other cereals, and will those who pin their sole faith on gold neglect to have a stock of the next useful stand-by—namely, silver!

I am sure that the same countries who are now anxious to ruin themselves in trying to get rid of their stocks of silver in a market devoid of buyers will become the most anxious buyers of that metal themselves in a time not far distant.

STABLE STANDARD OF VALUE—EXISTING DANGEROUS POSITION

By Lord Hunsdon

I think that The Financial Times is rendering a public service in promoting a discussion of bimetallism in its columns, because the opinion of the city on currency questions will certainly carry weight, and, in view of the dangerous position which now exists, it is not likely to be influenced by prejudice either for or against the system.

The case for bimetallism, or at all events for a consideration of that system, has been placed before the public in "The Times" recently by many influential people, without eliciting any reply, and as bimetallism had been the currency system of the world from the dawn of commerce up to 1873, it appears to me that if gold monometallists have anything to say in defense of the present system—which is a modern experiment—it is up to them to say it now or to allow the case to go against them by default.

Speaking for myself, and, I think, for other bimetallists, we do not imagine that bimetallism would cure all the evils from which this country and the world are now suffering.

It would not, for instance, prevent the United States of America from stopping the purchase of goods from us by her tariffs or prevent us from purchasing goods from her and having to pay for them in metallic money.

It would not stop parties in the State from bribing the electorate wholesale by pensions, doles, and other social services.

It would not, in fact, mean a return to complete sanity, but what it would do would be to give the world a more stable standard of value, a par of exchange between gold and silver-using countries, greater purchasing power to China, and would restore value to the silver hoards of India and consequently produce an atmosphere in that country favorable to our continued occupation. Above all, it would raise prices and enable individual debtors and debtor countries to fulfill their engagements, and, if speedily introduced, would give the world a breathing space to set its house in order.

The present position is that our budget does not balance, that we cannot collect our debts, that our taxation is heavier than that of any other country, and finally, that a flight from the pound is threatened owing to the loss of our former credit, which evil a rise in bank rate by itself is obviously incapable of checking.

It seems fair, then, to ask monometallists: What is your remedy?

BEST METHOD OF EXPANDING CREDIT—MONETARY INSUFFICIENCY HANDICAP

By Sir William Dampier, Sc.D., F.R.S.

The financial crisis is due to causes partly national and partly international.

The immediate cause of the economic troubles from which the world is suffering is the continued fall of the general average level of prices—the rise in the commodity value of money. Owing to this change, all fixed or semifixed charges become more and more burdensome. Profits vanish, inroads are made on capital, then the wheels of industry stop. Industrial depression, in turn, lowers prices further; the whole process becomes cumulative.

So far, there is, I think, no difference of responsible opinion. It is when we push the analysis further and seek the causes of the fall in prices that argument begins. Some fix their eyes on commodities and talk about overproduction. Others think only of money, and point to the shortage of gold or to its maldistribution. The truth, as usual, lies between. Price is the sum of money in cash or credit we pay for a unit of goods or services, and the average level of prices depends both on the amount of currency and credit in circulation and on the amount of commodities available for the world's trade. Prices can be lowered either by an increase in the stock of goods or a decrease in the supply of money, and raised either by restricting output or by increasing the amount of money and credit or its velocity of turnover.

OUTPUT RESTRICTION DANGEROUS

Deliberate restriction of output is dangerous, as the history of rubber shows. Moreover, it tends to prevent that growth in wealth on which all economic progress ultimately rests. If we want to put up the level of world prices, we must look to the other factor, and increase our store of money and credit. But we must also somehow get them into circulation.

The first reform needed to produce a rise in world prices, a reduction in the value of money, is the cancelation of international war debts or the facilitation of relending operations. Secondly, an expansion of credit is necessary, so that trade, as it revives, shall not be checked by monetary insufficiency.

The first is obviously an international problem and cannot be solved unless the new creditor countries will forego their war debts or learn London's habit of foreign lending. The second is equally, though less obviously, international also. No one country can lower the value of its currency without putting up its internal prices compared with those of other countries, thus destroying its export trade and risking the great danger of run-away inflation. And the effect on world prices will be small and long delayed. But, if all the chief nations agree, reform would be easy.

Accepting the present international gold standard, the central banks could guarantee each other in raising the ratio of credit to reserves. This would be effective once trade revived, but would do little or nothing to start a revival. In a perfectly reasonable world there would be no need for a metallic basis for our currency. Credit could be created or withdrawn so as to keep the price-level, as shown by an index number, approximately constant. But experience shows that a metallic basis gives to currency a security partly real and partly psychological. There is probably enough gold to carry the world's present business at a higher level of prices were not that gold badly distributed and partly useless. But the yearly output of gold is likely to diminish, and, in default of action, a further fall in prices will follow.

SILVER'S REMONETIZATION AND CREDIT

For all these reasons, I am inclined to think that a remonetization of silver is the best method of expanding the world's credit, and diminishing slightly and slowly the commodity value of its various currencies—that is, of putting up the average price level of world commodities with no fear of dangerous inflation. This policy would have the additional advantage of restoring the purchasing power of India and China and other silver-using and silver-producing countries.

The stock of silver in the world is large and could readily be increased. This would tend to keep the supplies of money in step with business, and, therefore, prices constant.

CALAMITOUS FALL IN PRICE—PURELY ARTIFICIAL ORIGIN

By the Right Honorable L. S. Amery, M.P.

The terrible economic crisis from which the whole world is suffering today is, in the main, a monetary crisis. Its direct cause is the progressive shortage of gold as compared with the world's needs for currency. That shortage has been due, in part, to the actual insufficiency of the world's new gold production to keep up with the total increase of production. In its last acute phase it has mainly arisen from the locking up of nearly three-quarters of the world's gold supply in two countries, France and the United States.

The consequent disastrous rise in the price of gold as compared with goods has been aggravated by a no less disastrous fall in the price of silver over the last three years, a fall of from 26d an ounce to about 13d an ounce. That the value of the only medium of purchase of the 400 million inhabitants of China and of the accumulated savings of the 350 million inhabitants of India has been halved has inevitably affected the rest of the world.

MARKET IMPOVERISHMENT

It has added to the difficulties of our manufacturers by the impoverishment of two markets already among the most important in the world and of immense capacity for absorbing overproduction elsewhere if only they were allowed to expand instead of being artificially contracted. It has helped to force down raw material prices yet further by what is in effect involuntary dumping. The indirect reactions of this situation in agrarian discontent, sedition, and boycott in India and in civil war in China have struck a further heavy blow at the prosperity of the world as a whole and of this country and of Lancashire in particular. It is, I believe, no exaggeration to say that until the price of silver is restored there is no chance of the solution of the Indian political crisis or of the establishment of an efficient Government in China.

What has caused this calamitous fall in the price of silver? The answer is misguided Government action. The fall in silver has been purely artificial. Since the war the production of silver from the mines has never equalled the demand. In fact, over the whole period 1920 to 1930 the demand has exceeded the commercial supply by some 328,000,000 ounces. But over that same period governments have dumped some 408,000,000 ounces on the market, partly, like the British Government, as a result of debasing their silver coinage, but even more, like the Indian and French Indo-Chinese Governments, in pursuance of the policy of selling their silver currency reserves in order to acquire gold and get on to a gold standard. It is the sale of 200,000,000 ounces since 1927, chiefly by the two Governments last mentioned, which has been the main cause of the recent break in price.

* * * * * * *

The advantage gained by a mere increase in the commodity price of silver would be greatly enhanced if silver could be introduced into the currency system of the gold standard world to expand its shrinking supply of gold. That need not involve bimetallism in the ordinary sense of the word. It would be quite enough if the leading central banks were authorized to keep a percentage, say, 15 percent, of their metallic currency reserve in silver at the market price. Action on these lines would afford, I believe, by far the quickest and most immediately effective remedy to the whole world crisis.

The permanent remedy of a situation which if left unremedied may destroy our civilization should, in my opinion, also include some definite incorporation of silver with gold, at a fixed ratio, in the world's metallic exchange medium and as an element in world currency.

THE WORLD'S MONETARY PROBLEMS—MODERN EXPERIENCE MUST GUIDE

[By the Right Honorable Sir Robert Horne, G.B.E., K.C., M.P.]

There never was a time when it was more necessary for all economic theories and financial methods to be reviewed in the light of modern experience. So many rule-of-thumb methods have broken down; so many orthodox beliefs have failed in practice, that it is incumbent upon everyone to examine the foundations upon which his opinions and action are based. Among the questions that now clamor for fresh judgments are the problems connected with the monetary systems of the world. The fact that Great Britain has now been forced to suspend the application of the gold standard to our transactions, and that the operation of this well tried and famous system has brought about such amazing dislocations in the world, produces, by itself, a sufficient upset in people's minds to induce reflection and creates a readiness to revise opinions which had long appeared to be settled beyond controversy.

Among the problems which are now pressing themselves upon thoughtful minds, the silver question has recently assumed high importance. An expert in finance, who not many months ago said to me that he regarded the silver question as a chose jugee, told me last week that he was now convinced that the matter should be taken up afresh. The bimetallists at the end of last century who were defeated by the discovery of the vast gold resources of the Rand are once more taking up the cudgels in favor of a view which they never abandoned and which, as they will tell you, has been justified and confirmed by the course which events have taken. Much of the world's financial trouble and the startling events of recent days could have been avoided, as they will assure you, if only silver had not been deprived of the position which, up till 1873, it held in some of the important currencies of the world. For myself, coming to a fresh consideration of the problem after a lapse of many years, I am inclined to agree substantially with their view.

Our country has for some weeks been preoccupied with the task of balancing our national budget. Behind this duty lies, as nearly everyone acknowledges, the necessity of creating a favorable balance of trade. When the latter object has been achieved, our domestic position will be reinforced and our prospects of welfare greatly improved.

THE PARALYSIS OF WORLD TRADE

But even after these things have been done, there is no chance of enduring prosperity for any country unless certain things happen which affect in common all the nations of the world. The Macmillan committee has recently investigated with surpassing care the conditions which have caused the paralysis of world trade and the distressful condition of unemployment which affects every country. The conclusion at which these distinguished experts arrived ought constantly to be kept in mind by everybody who is seeking a solution for the adversity from which humanity is at present suffering. They find the core of the malady to lie in the catastrophic fall in commodity prices which has taken place in recent years, and they make it plain that, unless something can be done by which these will be raised, a serious disaster will be caused to all countries of the world alike.

"The avoidance," they say, "of such an event should be a prime object of international statesmanship. Our objective should be, insofar as it lies within the power of this country, to influence the international price level, first of all to raise prices a long way above the present level and then to maintain them at the level thus reached with as much stability as can be managed. We recommend that this objective be accepted as the guiding aim of the monetary policy of this country."

There will be few who will refuse to accept this considered judgment. The spectacle of the primary producers of the world attempting to meet debts contracted when their produce was twice as valuable in the market as it is now will be sufficient to convince even the most skeptical. Cast your eye over the primary producers of the world—in Australia, in New Zealand, in South America, in the Malay Peninsula, in the tea and sugar-producing areas—and you will witness the blight which has been caused by the terrible fall in price levels. Look again at the unemployment in the great manufacturing districts of Britain and Germany and America and you will see the effect of the inability of the commodity-producing countries to purchase manufactured goods. When, however, we talk of low commodity prices, the fact that they are depressed to such an extent in the case of the whole range of primary articles of production suggests that it is the standard of value which has gone up in relation to the things which it measures. A moment's reflection confirms this view when it is seen that gold, in which the debts of the world have in the main to be paid, has become more and more the particular possession of the two great creditor nations of the world and is scarce in every other country. The problem, therefore, which the Macmillan committee sets is in another aspect that of getting down the value of gold.

* * * * * * *

The value of silver, like that of any other commodity, is measured in terms of gold. Silver, however, is more than a commodity, because in China and Mexico it forms the monetary currency, and in India, although that great community is now on a gold bullion standard, silver forms the reserve for 85 percent of the currency. An increase in the price of silver would, by itself, have an appreciable effect in mitigating the high price of gold and would thus effect some augmentation on the general level of commodity prices.

BANK OF ENGLAND VIEWS

To make this plain I need only quote a passage from the evidence which was given by the Governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Montagu Norman, and Sir Charles Addis, a member of the court, before the committeee on Indian currency in the year 1926. In their joint evidence they made the following statement:

"I think that one also has to bear in mind the interaction between gold and silver prices. There is a reaction upon gold prices when an extreme fall or rise takes place in the value of silver, which is none the less serious because it is indirect and not very apparent on the surface. The consequential changes in prices generally and in trade conditions which would be produced; the disturbance to the world's economic peace and confidence; the interference with the long-established social habits of the people of India in the use of silver; the shock to the reliance of a great country like China upon silver as a medium of currency and a common store of value, could not fail to have important effects upon the gold prices of countries in Europe and, indeed, in America."

All the troubles which these two distinguished bankers predicted have occurred. The result of the change in India to a gold bullion standard, coupled with the resolution to sell on the market a vast portion of the store of rupees which the Indian Government possesses, has artificially depressed the price of silver to a greater degree than that of other commodities; has injuriously affected the purchasing power of nearly a thousand millions of the world's population in India and China; and has reacted upon the gold prices of staple articles of production. These ill effects have been intensified by the sale of large quantities of demonetized silver by Indo-China, which, in the spring of last year, adopted a gold bullion standard. If by some action on the part of Governments the price of silver could be restored to some moderate level, it would seem reasonable to suppose that, in addition to the incentive which would be given to purchases by India and China, a beneficial result would be attained in connection with the general level of gold prices.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] will now occupy 1 hour of the time allotted to those on this side of the aisle.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, by my votes here I have expressed my interest in the American silver producer and the American silver miner, but I am not so much concerned about the Asiatic.

From the very beginning a great deal of mystery has enshrouded this administration's succession of maneuvers with American money.

Only a few days ago the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], one of our distinguished envoys to the ill-fated World Trade Conference last June at London, solemnly informed us that 2,500,000,000 ounces of silver are hoarded in the walls of huts and underground in China, and that probably 5,000,000,000 to 6,000,000,000 ounces of silver are contained in the bracelets, necklaces, earrings, bangles, and other jewelry of the women of India.

For that reason, said Mr. PITTMAN—page 9210 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 22, 1934—there is very little likelihood that this silver would ever come into the world market to disturb the dreams of those who would ride us out of the depression in a magic silver chariot.

Upon this sweeping assumption, Mr. President, the able Senator from Nevada, if I read his remarks correctly, had the confidence to base a silver rehabilitation plan which would intimately affect not only our whole monetary system but our whole economic system and, in turn, every household in America.

I, of course, do not pretend to have any profound knowledge of the Chinese character, except to note in passing that those who have had business dealings with Chinese importers and exporters usually credit them with a considerable degree of financial acumen, in addition to exceptional courtesy and a high standard of integrity.

Similarly, with regard to the women of India, I must admit that my acquaintance with their habits of mind is indeed meager. I can only state in this connection that I do not wholly share the Senator from Nevada's seemingly simple faith that when the price of silver begins to rise, through the manipulation of governments, that all of this 7,500,000,000 to 8,500,000,000 ounces of silver is going to remain in hoarding in China or in India.

Mr. President, I make this statement with full knowledge of the fact that under the Pittman silver agreement the Government of India is pledged not to dispose of, by sale, more than 140,000,000 ounces of silver during the period of 4 years, commencing January 1, 1934, and that the Government of China shall not sell silver resulting from demonetized coins for a period of 4 calendar years, commencing January 1, 1934.

Certainly no such phenomena can be said to have accompanied the skyrocketing of the price of domestic gold in our country. Of course, before we began to offer the extraordinary price of $34 an ounce for gold, instead of the former price of $20.67, nearly all of the gold in our country had been drawn out of the hands of its citizens and impounded by the Government.

Nevertheless, if current reports are a criterion, the so-called "old gold"—that is, gold in watches, trinkets, jewelry, and so forth—is being daily melted and thrust on the market at swollen prices.

So does it not seem somewhat utopian for the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to imagine that the citizens of China, with all the wisdom of the ages behind them, and possibly harder pressed by adversity than we are, or that the women of India, having all their wealth in silver trinkets, will act any differently when they see opulence beyond their wildest dreams thrust upon them from far-off America? Regardless of Government edicts, will not the market be glutted with this vast hoard of silver?

Is it not incredible to stake our Nation's destiny on the whim or caprice of the women of India? In a similar situation I can well imagine American housewives selling even their silver plate!

Mr. President, I had hoped that never again would this Nation be torn with dissension over silver as it was in the closing decades of the last century and the early part of the present one. Then, as now, a sorely stricken people were led to believe that the introduction of more silver into our currency would cure all of our troubles.

It is stated that the Government must utilize silver in order to enlarge its metallic reserves so as to be able to print a larger amount of paper money. The relatively low amount of money now in circulation—between $5,000,000,000 and $6,000,000,000—is pointed to as justifying such statements, although, as everyone knows, the bulk of our business transactions are concluded by means of bank checks.

However, when it is considered that our stock of gold has been artificially revalued so that what was formerly worth, roundly, $4,000,000,000 is now held to be worth $7,500,000,000, it can clearly be seen that there is no necessity whatever for remonetizing silver on this plea.

This $7,500,000,000 of gold, on the new basis of valuation, is sufficient for the issuance of at least $18,000,000,000 of gold-backed currency on the basis of 40-percent gold reserve, the present lawful requirement; but should the reserve requirement be reduced to 25 percent, as the able Senator from Nevada once suggested, it would be sufficient to issue Federal Reserve notes of considerably more than $25,000,000,000. This is far more than the amount of notes that the Senator from Nevada proposes to issue on the silver that he would have our Government buy.

If the issuance of more metal-backed currency is the touchstone of prosperity, why did not those in charge of the management of our currency issue it many months ago?

Mr. President, I am not here undertaking to defend or condone in any way this revaluation of gold, which is an unwarranted, outrageous, and dishonorable piece of business, the kind of legerdemain that hitherto has been reserved to governments tottering on the brink of disaster.

I merely wish to cite the fact that whenever the Government chooses it may lawfully issue at least $25,000,000,000 of gold-backed Federal Reserve notes, or approximately five times the amount of such notes at present in circulation.

To enter upon a discussion as to why this amount of gold-backed money is not now in circulation, flowing into every city, town, and hamlet in the land, would require more time than is now at my disposal. It is enough to state that, in my opinion, were it not for the Government's grotesque attempt to manage the hitherto private affairs of its 125,000,000 citizens—a management that is now bereft of resources after a year of conspicuous but ineffective experimentation—such a flow of gold-backed money, redeemable at the will of the possessor, might even now be quickening the economic life of our tormented people, bringing light and hope to the faces that have been darkened by 4 years of suffering and adversity.

Mr. President, to allege that more silver is needed in order to issue more metal-backed paper money is the rankest kind of sophistry.

Since the creation of additional paper money obviously cannot be the reason for this sudden reversion to silver, we, perhaps, must look elsewhere, perhaps across the seas, for the true solution of the mystery.

With the indulgence of the Senate I shall proceed to disclose what might lead to an astonishing international intrigue that seemingly from the beginning has fascinated the present administration, or possibly springs from a desperation that is all the more intense because so many elegant theories have been shattered on the hard rocks of the grim actualities of a war-tortured world.

How insidiously, Mr. President, has the word "nationalization" crept into our national lexicon! That, as is well known, was for a long time a sort of euphemism used to conceal the expropriation by governments of the people's property. We spoke of Russia's nationalization of the land, meaning, of course, that its Soviet Government had seized the land and converted it to its own use; and the same condition, Mr. President, is to be found in America today, where the Government of the United States is reclaiming lands.

When the gold in this country was first impounded, the word "nationalization" was not used. Now, however, with the lapse of time, we find high officials referring to the nationalization of gold, and now to the nationalization of silver, as if this were some naturally patriotic process instead of a species of brigandage on a grand scale.

While in quest of the inner motives for the unprecedented step of the seizure and impoundment of all gold, the repudiation of the letter of our gold bonds, the subsequent devaluation of gold, and the present reliance on what to all practical purposes is an inconvertible fiat money, it will be necessary to review briefly the events of the year that followed the somewhat hysterical hundred days.

Far-reaching laws having been hastily enacted at this memorable session of the Congress for domestic revival, our Government turned with a great deal of pomp and panoply of state to the world trade conference about to assemble at London.

In vain did I point out in this Chamber last year that the two programs, the domestic and the foreign, were wholly antagonistic. Mine was as a voice crying in the wilderness when I stated that if the Government chose to regiment the farms, factories, and the mines of this Nation it must shield its economic creation with an invulnerable protective tariff; that we could not reduce tariffs in conformance with the wishes of our European and other debtors and at the same time ask the farmers, miners, and industrialists of the Nation to submit to Government dictation. It was decreed that the expedition to London should proceed.

Something of the mystery connected with the various maneuvers of the administration in relation to the Nation's gold stocks was soon cleared away by the report, seemingly authentic, that it would be proposed by the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, at London that the United States share its gold with destitute foreign nations.

It was stated that the coverage of the United States Federal Reserve currency will be reduced from 40 to 25 percent in order to release about $2,000,000,000 of American gold in pursuance of the scheme. Furthermore, it was indicated that the United States Federal Reserve System would be officially linked with the Bank for International Settlements at Basel or to a new institution affiliated with this so-called "world bank." Thus the United States would become a member of a financial league of nations.

No more daring abrogation of the sovereignty of the United States had been suggested since the late President Wilson came home from Versailles with article X of the Covenant of the League of Nations. This scheme would yield up American gold as backing for an international currency, and, while intended as a stabilization move, in effect would make the United States responsible for the integrity and stability of all the motly European currencies, ranging from the Polish zloty to the Yugoslavian dinar. Apparently the principal reason for the maneuver was that many nations, excepting France and England, which have the largest gold stocks in their history, have no gold, while the United States has plenty.

Why the United States should have been precipitately taken off the gold standard, when it then had gold stocks sufficient for the emission of $7,000,000,000 Federal Reserve currency, nearly twice as much as is now extant, has never been explained. It was not necessary for the Government to take such a radical step, and it was apparently contrary to the speeches and pledges of President Roosevelt.

Three days before the election Mr. Roosevelt said:

> The business men of the country, battling hard to maintain their financial solvency and integrity, were told in blunt language at Des Moines, Iowa, how close an escape this country had some months ago from going off the gold standard. But, that, my friends, as has been clearly shown since, was a libel on the credit of the United States.

In praising Senator GLASS' stand for sound money, the then candidate for the Presidency also said:

> It is worthy of note that no answer has been made to the magnificent philippic of Senator GLASS the other night, in which he showed how unsound this position was. And, I might add, Senator GLASS made a devastating challenge that no responsible government would have sold to the countries securities payable in gold if it knew that the promise—yes, the covenant—embodied in those securities was as dubious as the President of the United States claims it was.

Here the man who was later elected President boldly acclaimed the gold clause of the United States bonds as a sacred covenant between the people who bought the bonds and their Government. He denounced as libelous the statement that the United States was in danger of going off the gold standard. But the subsequent events proved otherwise.

Early in March, by means of a manipulation of the press, it was made to appear that the President actually had ordered all people to yield up their gold. Glaring, awe-inspiring headlines stampeded many citizens into giving up small gold nest eggs, in many cases representing the savings of a lifetime.

The actual order against gold hoarding was not issued until April 5, 1933, requiring all persons, with certain exceptions, to yield up their gold. The constitutionality of this procedure was at once attacked, the dissenters including such notable persons as former Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri, who said the Constitution had been made into "a scrap of paper." When the dead line arrived on May 1, 1933, it was found that nearly $500,000,000 of gold was still in hiding, and since then it was revealed by the Treasury that more than 1,000 persons had defied their Government, although the President's proclamation had branded them as statutory criminals.

Then came the President's sensational gold exporting embargo order of April 20, 1933, officially taking the country off the gold standard and placing an embargo on all exports, with certain exceptions. One of these exceptions was that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, could allow the export of gold held in trust for the Bank of International Settlements. This bank was set up originally for the handling of German reparations; but, under the plan since rumored, it would become a superworld bank, with the central banks of all nations directly or indirectly tributary to it.

The mystery of the President's gold hoarding and embargo maneuvers only deepened. It was explained that the maneuver had been necessitated by depreciated foreign currencies. But that statement did not seem consistent because the Democratic leadership was publicly committed to lower tariffs. The effect of the gold-embargo order, depreciating the American dollar on foreign exchange, was to elevate the tariff. Foreign nations, which formerly enjoyed a tariff advantage of 35 to 50 cents off the American dollar, no longer had that advantage, because our dollar was sinking to their level and soon sold at 81 cents, the lowest since 1879, in comparison with the French gold franc. When we went off the gold standard the French 15-percent surtax automatically went into effect overnight against our imports based on our depreciated money.

Mr. President, early in 1932 I had proposed a similar automatic surtax against depreciated foreign currencies, because these currencies were enabling foreign nations to filter through and under our tariff wall with goods paid for in debased foreign moneys. My amendment was defeated. So it could scarcely be said a year later, with any degree of consistency, that the gold-embargo order was necessitated by depreciated foreign currencies. Had the administration desired to lower our tariffs, as pledged in their platform, one of the best ways to have accomplished it without legislation would have been to continue on the gold standard, for with the manipulation of degraded foreign money Europeans, as well as Asiatics, were finding a ready access to our markets, so much so that manufacturers and industrial workers were complaining that they could not operate their plants against such competition.

What, then, was the real reason for the hasty gold-embargo order of April 20? No one knows, except that it was then strongly indicated that those in control of the proposed superbank at Basle, as the prospective citadel of a financial league of nations, had something to do with it. Since all gold has been seized and impounded the United States Treasury has been turning over to the Federal Reserve System all the gold that it legally could, swelling the System's reserves far beyond the normal requirements.

The mystery grew deeper when the President, on May 26, 1933, caused the Congress to enact a joint resolution making all forms of American currency legal tender, whether gold-backed money or greenbacks, and repudiating the gold clause of the United States bonds.

The gold-repudiation resolution had several effects. It affected about $100,000,000,000 of domestic debts that hitherto were required to be paid in gold. It reduced the $11,000,000,000 of foreign war debts owed to the United States, as well as the $15,000,000,000 long- and short-term debts owed by foreign nations to American private financiers, so that, instead of $26,000,000,000, we have reduced the foreign debt to some $15,000,000,000. All these foreign obligations were to be paid in gold, but our Government, by dishonoring its own bonds, opened the way for them to pay in depreciated American currencies.

The basic problem of putting 12,000,000 to 15,000,000 persons back to work remained unchanged, because the administration had avoided a decision on the great major issues, which, until they are decided rightly, cannot restore confidence to informed leaders of American opinion. These issues are the tariff and the war debts. Thus, cancelationists of foreign debts won a partial victory, because our Government accepted defaults or token payments as a prelude to further cancelation of these debts through the medium of silver.

The United States Government had about $11,000,000,000 invested abroad as a result of the war. Private American investors had about $15,000,000,000 invested in foreign lands, making a total of $26,000,000,000. The carrying charge on these debts amounts to about $1,000,000,000 a year. If that $1,000,000,000 was to be paid us in foreign goods, it meant that the United States must sustain an enormous annual adverse balance of trade.

This was the issue that rocked the London Conference. It is the issue which the administration, as yet, has not mustered up the courage to face, because the administration so far has floundered between a policy of outright protectionism of American industry, which would seem to be demanded by the Gargantuan industrial, agrarian, and transportation machines which the Government is undertaking to manage, and lowered tariffs which would permit our European debtors to pay off at the expense of the American workingman and taxpayer.

There were for a time signs that the administration, confronted by the demand of industrialists, who said they could not run their plants without protection, had veered to protectionism, which has been the historic American bulwark of peace and plenty. The President had the power of embargo. He might have, by virtue of his dictatorship, embargoed each and every foreign product that sought to enter the American market. But for more than a year, and not until Great Britain had set the example, did he choose to exercise that power.

The London Conference of 1933 was adjourned with a fine show of high-sounding platitudes about bilateral, quadrilateral, and multilateral tariff pacts, and universal most-favored-nation treaties, whilst America seemed safe and solid in self-containment and self-contentment behind a sturdy tariff wall.

As to the war debts, they, unfortunately, are still with us. There were three methods whereby our foreign debtors hoped to avoid payment. One was by outright cancelation. The second was by lowering the American tariff, which would mean nothing else than that the debt would be amortized at the expense of the American workingman. The third hope was by manipulation of currency and exchange.

Mr. President, world trade for many years has played a comparatively insignificant part in American prosperity, notwithstanding the school of economic theory, who maintains that world trade represents the difference between prosperity and disaster. The American market, the greatest free-trade area in the world, has always been nine times more important to us than our world trade, for at its peak, in 1929, it amounted to only 10 percent of our national business, and would have been much less than 10 percent but for the fact that foreign buyers were using the money they had borrowed from us.

Charts of the Nation's economy, covering long periods of years, show that when business is good under a high tariff, we actually buy more from Europe, while under a low tariff our domestic trade is reduced or destroyed. For 16 years the American domestic market has averaged a total of $64,000,000,000 a year. Here are the figures:

1914	33,000,000,000
1919	68,000,000,000
1920	74,000,000,000
1921	54,000,000,000
1922	60,000,000,000
1923	71,000,000,000
1924	71,000,000,000
1925	78,000,000,000
1926	80,000,000,000
1927	79,000,000,000
1928	82,000,000,000
1929	85,000,000,000
1930	70,000,000,000
1931	52,000,000,000
1932	45,000,000,000

Mr. President, I wish to insert in the RECORD a tabulation showing the money in circulation outside of the Treasury and Federal Reserve banks in the 5 years ending with 1929, and at certain dates since that year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOTAL CURRENCY IN CIRCULATION

June 30, 1925	$4,734,000,000
June 30, 1926	4,835,000,000
June 30, 1927	4,745,000,000
June 30, 1928	4,797,000,000
June 30, 1929	4,746,000,000
June 30, 1930	4,522,000,000
June 30, 1931	4,822,000,000

June 30, 1932	5,695,000,000
Dec. 31, 1932	5,674,000,000
Jan. 31, 1933	5,644,000,000
Feb. 28, 1933	6,545,000,000
Mar. 8, 1933 (peak)	7,538,000,000
Mar. 31, 1933	6,319,000,000
June 30, 1933	5,720,000,000
Nov. 30, 1933	5,742,000,000
Apr. 30, 1934	5,367,000,000

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President. It is interesting to note that less money was in circulation during the 5-year period preceding the depression than in the period following the depression. In fact, the peak was reached March 8, 1933.

In prosperous times trade is carried on by means of bank credit, and not actual currency; but when the banks begin to restrict credit, as always happens in depression periods, currency is taken from the vaults of the banks by depositors and used in commerce and trade when credit is denied. The table I have just had inserted in the RECORD bears out this statement. No matter how much money is placed in circulation, it will flow back into the vaults of the banks and bank checks and bank credit used as a circulating medium. Therefore, what the country needs is not more money in circulation, but a sound currency system which will give confidence to the people, and also an extended bank credit to enable business to develop in a normal way without fear of inflation or any of the unsound theories and experiments that have arisen and have been placed in practice by this administration.

At this point I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a table showing the stocks of money in the United States and the amount in circulation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Year	Stock of money in United States	In circulation
		Amount	Per capita
1800	$28,000,000	$25,500,000	$4.99
1860	442,102,000	435,407,000	13.85

1933, June	10,078,416,000	5,720,764,000	45.51

NOTE.—A majority of economists agree, and it can be seen from the figures given above, that the amount of money in circulation has very little to do with prosperity. If prosperity depended upon currency in circulation it would be easy to maintain prosperity. More important than the amount is the velocity of the money in circulation. From the per capita figures above it may be noted that the amount for each person did not decrease during depression years, but in fact was above some of the prosperous periods the country enjoyed.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, at its peak, in 1929, all world trade, which, of course, included our share of it, amounted to no more than $68,000,000,000. It has now shrunk to the pitifully low level of $12,000,000,000, not because of our high tariff but because American capital has ceased to finance the impoverished exchequers of Europe. They hve been impoverished not so much by the war debts as they have by reason of their excessive expenditures for armaments, which amount, in the case of four leading powers alone, to $2,000,000,000 a year.

Our share of world trade was small because of the American standard of living. If we want to reduce our standard of living to that of Europe and Asia, we can obtain a lion's share of the world trade. By lowering our tariff we could admit a lot of sweat-shop and pauper-wage foreign commodities into our market. To meet such competition American manufacturers would have to slash wages. We do not want to do that, nor would the American people stand for any such course. It was only when they were tortured by the misery of the depression, which partly grew out of the strangulation of European trade by punitive European tariffs, and the impoverishment of war, that our people would consent to or even listen to any appeal for lower tariffs.

While we have reduced the obligations due us by foreigners some $10,000,000,000, we have added this $10,000,000,000 to the backs of American taxpayers. But I fear that the course will now be otherwise, for according to the proposal of Senator PITTMAN at London in 1933, we are to reduce the gold backing of our Federal Reserve currency from 40 to 25 percent and replace the remaining 25 percent of gold with 20 percent of silver. That process, it is estimated, would give American silver producers a subsidy of $250,000,000, or enough to absorb their total output for the next 5 years.

Mr. President, I here ask leave to have printed as a part of my remarks the text of the Senator from Nevada's amazing proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PITTMAN'S SILVER PROPOSAL

LONDON, June 19.—The text of the resolution dealing with gold and silver presented to a committee of the World Economic Conference today by Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, follows:

"Whereas confusion exists in the field of international exchange; and

"Whereas it is essential to world recovery that an international monetary standard should be reestablished: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That all the nations participating in this conference agree:

"1. That it is in the interests of all concerned that stability in the international monetary field be attained as quickly as practicable.

"2. That gold should be reestablished as the international measure of exchange values.

"3. That the use of gold should be confined to its employment as cover for circulation and as a medium for settling international balances of payment. This means that gold either in coin or bullion will be withdrawn from circulation.

"4. That in order to improve the workings of a future gold standard, a uniform legal minimum gold cover for the currencies of various countries which shall adopt the gold standard shall be established, and that this legal minimum reserve shall be lower than the average of present reserve requirements.

"5. That central banks of various nations be requested to meet at once in order to consider adoption of such a uniform minimum reserve ratio, and that a metal cover of 25 percent be recommended for their consideration.

"And further,

"Whereas silver constitutes an important medium both in international and domestic exchange for a large proportion of the world's population; and

"Whereas the value of this purchasing medium has been impaired by governmental action in the past; and

"Whereas it is necessary that the confidence of the east should be restored in its purchasing medium, which can only be done if the price of silver is restored to an equilibrium with commodity price levels: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That—

"1. An agreemnt be sought between the chief silver-producing countries and those countries which are large holders or users of silver to limit arbitrary sales upon the world market.

"2. That all nations agree to prevent further debasement of their subsidiary silver coinages.

"3. That all nations agree to remonetize their subsidiary coinages up to a fineness of at least 800, when, and if consistent with their respective national budget problems.

"4. That it be recommended to central banks that they agree that 80 percent of their metal cover shall be in gold and 20 percent shall be optionally in gold or in silver, provided that silver is obtainable at or below a price to be agreed upon as corresponding to the general commodity price level and that governments agree to modify their respective laws to this effect."

Mr. HATFIELD. The most amazing part of this program as reported is that it is intended to earmark for the Bank of International Settlements at least $425,000,000 of impounded American gold in order that the world bank may issue an international currency. That would be an astonishingly simple way to solve the problem of the war debts and thus refurbish the straitened credit of Europe at the expense of America. We then would be paid with international paper money, backed by $425,000,000 of gold wrested from the American people, who are denied at present the right to possess a single gold coin. The rest of the support for this paper money would be European paper promises, such as we already have and which have been dishonored and repudiated by nearly everyone of the borrowers.

This is feared by many observers to be the true explanation of all the incredible monetary maneuvers of the administration and its necessity for obtaining absolute power over the Nation's gold and the Nation's industrial activities.

Mr. President, there seemingly is abundant proof in the press and in official and semiofficial utterances for the statement that from the beginning the administration has dallied with schemes to link our Federal Reserve Banking System to the Bank for International Settlements at Basel, Switzerland. Should I be in error in this surmise, I should gladly welcome an explanation for the varied monetary maneuvers which, from time to time, have agitated this Nation and, indeed, the whole world for the past year or more.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to insert as part of my remarks some excerpts from official documents, as well as reports from the press in relation to our monetary program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the text of the President's gold-hoarding order of Apr. 5, 1933]

SEC. 2. All persons are hereby required to deliver, on or before May 1, 1933, to a Federal Reserve bank or a branch or agency thereof, or to any member bank of the Federal Reserve System, all gold coin, gold bullion, and gold certificates now owned by them or coming into their ownership on or before April 28, 1933, except the following:

(C) GOLD COIN AND BULLION EARMARKED OR HELD IN TRUST FOR A RECOGNIZED FOREIGN GOVERNMENT OR FOREIGN CENTRAL BANK OR THE BANK FOR INTERNATIONAL SETTLEMENTS

[From the text of the President's Executive order covering the exporting of gold, Apr. 20, 1933]

SECTION 1. Until further order, the earmarking for foreign account and the export of gold coin, gold bullion, or gold certificates from the United States, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof are hereby prohibited, except that the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion and subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, may issue licenses authorizing the export of gold coin and bullion (a) earmarked or held in trust for a recognized foreign government or foreign central bank or the Bank for International Settlements.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, June 4, 1933]

On March 1, or 2 days before the Nation-wide banking holiday became effective, the monetary gold stock of the United States was $4,344,000,000. But of this amount only $2,892,000,000 was in the possession of the Federal Reserve, the remainder being with the Treasury and with the public. First, the administration took steps to get the public's gold back in the Federal Reserve where it could be used to support the Nation's currency and credit structure, instead of being used by the public as a store of value, and now the Treasury's gold is being herded into the System.

How much has been accomplished in the drive to fortify the Federal Reserve's gold holdings is shown in the fact that on March 1, the Treasury and the public had 33.42 percent of the Nation's gold, while on May 31 they had only 18.74 percent of it. When the gold stocks of this country reached their highest level in history on September 16, 1931, at $5,015,000,000, the Federal Reserve's gold represented only 69.12 percent of the total * * *.

Of the $4,311,000,000 of gold coin and bullion which comprised the monetary gold stock of the United States on April 30, the Treasury held $3,228,770,124; the Federal Reserve, $747,173,509; and the public, $334,823,033. The System, however, was really making use of, and including in its own reserves, most of the gold which was described as held in Treasury. Thus the Treasury held on deposit $1,665,000,000 of the System's gold as reserves against its note issue and deposits.

The Treasury had $1,265,000,000 of gold in trust against a like amount of gold certificates. But, as the Federal Reserve had $942,000,000 of these gold certificates and the public had $323,000,000, the amount of gold immobilized in this connection was only the latter figure. As the gold certificates come back from circulation and find their way to the Federal Reserve, they are included in the System's gold reserves. The amount of gold certificates retired from circulation and added to the System's gold since September 1931 was $714,000,000 at the end of April.

The two other principal amounts of gold held by the Treasury are the $156,039,088, as the prescribed reserve behind the $346,681,016 of greenbacks, and the $1,207,500 Treasury notes of 1890 and the $142,343,151 in its general fund. At the end of April, therefore, the Treasury really had only about $300,000,000 of gold which might be added to the Federal Reserve's holdings. Until there is a change in the law, however, the gold behind the greenbacks could hardly be handed over to the System, and there is a definite limit beyond which the gold in the general fund cannot fall until the law is changed.

Included in the general fund is chiefly the Federal Reserve's gold redemption fund, which must amount to 5 percent of that portion of the System's notes not covered by gold. Often in practice, however, the amount exceeds 5 percent. In May the gold redemption fund declined $18,000,000, but even after that reduction the fund was about $10,000,000 larger than it needed to be. By cutting the fund down and keeping gold rather than currency in the trust funds against national-bank notes, Postal Savings, and Federal Reserve bank notes, the Treasury can contribute importantly to the upbuilding of the System's gold holdings. * * *

The evidence lately afforded that the Treasury is turning in as much of its gold to the Federal Reserve as the law will permit it to do is welcomed in local banking circles as a sign that at last a start is being made toward ending the old cumbersome arrangement of having part of the country's gold with one agency and part with another. * * *

In practically all civilized countries, with the exception of the United States, the bank of issue has the nation's gold and has complete charge of the currency. In this country the Treasury, the Federal Reserve, and the national banks all emit currency.

[From the New York Times of May 5, 1933]

BASEL, SWITZERLAND, May 4.—The abandonment of the gold standard by the United States imperils the position of the two American members of the World Bank Board, Gates W. McGarrah, the president, and his alternate, Leon Fraser. And it raises even more the question of whether the Board's informal decision to elect Mr. Fraser to succeed Mr. McGarrah can be consummated on Monday, the day of the annual bank meeting and triennial election of officers and members of the Board.

The difficult situation originates from the fact that the statutes restrict the Bank's members to countries on the gold standard except the founders—for whom such a restriction was thought superfluous—and the fact that the Hoover administration refused to allow the Federal Reserve to belong to the World Bank.

Washington's attitude resulted in the special provision in the statutes giving the Board the option to elect two American members. The idea, which gained Washington's tacit approval, was to assure at least de facto contact, and Messrs. McGarrah and Fraser, since the election in 1930, have been considered by insiders as the Federal Reserve's representatives.

BASEL, May 8.—Unshaken faith in the gold standard and in political and economic, as well as financial, internationalism as one way out of the depression permeated Gates W. McGarrah's third annual report as president of the Bank for International Settlements at the general assembly here this afternoon.

The assembly, comprising the governors of all important central banks in Europe, thereupon, on the proposal of Vilem Pospisil, Governor of the Bank of Czechoslovakia, unanimously approved the Board's July resolution, which affirmed that "the gold standard remains the best available monetary mechanism." The annual report made it clear, however, that the bank was aiming to restore not the old system but a reformed gold standard.

Many took as a commentary on the American attitude toward the gold clause in American loans the passage in Mr. McGarrah's report, saying: "More and more, monetary experiences have demonstrated that the true use of gold in the modern world is to serve as a medium of international payment when exchanges or international balances are adverse", and inviting the central banks to combat the "conception that the gold is properly employable as a store of wealth or that its primary object is to assure internal convertibility of notes so that all who will may hoard gold coin."

[From the joint communique issued by the President and Signor Guido Jung, Italian Minister of Finance, May 6, 1933]

We are in agreement that a fixed measure of exchange values must be reestablished in the world, and we believe that this measure must be gold.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, June 4, 1933]

BASEL.—Monetary and economic restrictions increased in 1932. The false dawn of the August pick-up in Wall Street gave place to darkness deeper than ever, which culminated in the complete paralysis of the American banking system and the abandonment of gold by the dollar.

Against this gloomy background of world-wide disaster the Bank for International Settlements' third annual report was written. One of its salient features was that it urged "general restoration of a reformed gold standard without further delay." This appeared less than a month after the United States had left gold.

A "reformed" standard, as the bank sees it, will be one under which will be assured:

1. General redistribution of gold.
2. Lowering of the coverage ratio and abandonment of the use of gold in coinage or to insure internal convertibility of notes.
3. Fuller powers for central banks and greater freedom from internal political pressure.
4. Abandonment of nationalistic fiscal policies.
5. Increased cooperation between central banks based on more complete information on international monetary trends.

By Edwin L. James

* * * The monetary problem ties up directly to the gold problem. A few countries have 80 percent of the world's gold. The United States and France have over half of it. We have 40 percent backing of our currency, the British have 27 percent, and so on. It is reported that Washington is now considering the possibilities of a greater spread of the world's gold. It has not been stated how Washington thinks this could be worked out. There are obvious difficulties in the way of a creditor nation distributing its gold, since it does not mean to give it away.

The problem naturally recalls the idea of the centralization of the world's gold in one place; for example, the International Bank of Basle, with the issuance of certificates of deposit which could be used as backing for currencies. It is reasoned that in the same way that an ordinary bank can use its deposits several times over in financial or domestic business, so the International Bank could effect a greater use of the world's gold supply in financing currencies of the individual nations and in promoting world trade. There is also the old suggestion of some form of international money to be used in world trade, such money retaining its relation to gold regardless of fluctuations in national moneys.

It is interesting to note that the three great trading countries, Great Britain, the United States, and France, are all committed to gold. Neville Chamberlain said in Commons, Friday, that gold must be the stabilizing standard, and our own money is still legally on a gold basis, since the gold law of 1900 has not been repealed. If these countries can now or later fix a gold relation for their moneys the rest of the world will follow suit.

[From the New York Times of June 2, 1933]

RESPREAD OF GOLD TO BE URGED BY UNITED STATES AT LONDON PARLEY—CENTRAL BANK COOPERATION FOR REDISTRIBUTION IS LIKELY TO BE ASKED—25-PERCENT NOTE COVER ON PLAN—ONE-FIFTH OF METAL VALUE COULD BE IN SILVER—BACKING WOULD BE DROP FOR US—DELEGATES WORK ON SHIP—SECRETARY HULL CALLS MEETING TO ORGANIZE TEAMWORK FOR SPEED IN CONFERENCE NEGOTIATIONS

WASHINGTON, June 1.—Gradual redistribution of the world's gold through the cooperation of central banks and a world-wide 25-percent coverage for currency in circulation probably will be proposed at the London Economic Conference by the United States delegates, it was revealed here today.

Disclosure of the plan was made in conversations of Pedro Torrea, the Chilean delegate to the conference, and Benjamin Torres, the Chilean chargé d'affaires, at the State Department.

It is understood that both President Roosevelt and the State Department have discussed the proposals in some detail with the Chilean representatives. The concentration of 80 percent of the world's gold in five countries is regarded as one of the principal obstacles to the immediate return of a universal free-gold standard.

Of the 25-percent note coverage to be suggested, it is understood, central banks would be authorized to hold one-fifth in silver and the balance in gold.

The 25-percent coverage would be a decrease for the United States, which still maintains a legal 40 percent coverage, but would mean an increase for nearly all other countries. The ultimate disposition of the surplus stock in the Federal Reserve banks, the difference between the present ratio of about 68 percent against notes and deposits and the projected 25-percent ratio, is as yet undefined in the American plan.

At the present time the Federal Reserve System has about $3,300,000,000 worth of notes and bank notes actually in circulation. The told stock on hand, held exclusively against these notes, amounts to about $2,880,000,000. If the 25-percent ratio were adopted by the United States a gold stock of about $826,000,000 would be sufficient for legal coverage, thus presumably releasing $2,000,000,000 to other uses.

Should the silver plan also be adopted, one-fifth of the $826,000,000, about $165,000,000, could be replaced by silver and that amount of gold likewise released.

This theoretical surplus of gold would be predicated on the assumption that no further increase in the note circulation would be authorized. Under the present 40-percent coverage the gold stocks of $2,800,000,000 would permit a note issue of $7,000,000,000. At a 25-percent coverage ratio this amount of gold would protect notes up to more than $11,000,000,000.

The uncertainties contained in the American gold plan, it is thought here, can only be ironed out by international agreement in London. If such agreement is not forthcoming, it is predicted that one of the immediate tasks of the administration will be a final formulation of its monetary policy along strictly nationalistic lines advocated by Assistant Secretary Moley.

HULL ADVOCATES RESUMPTION OF FOREIGN LOANS—FORMING OF SPECIAL AGENCY TO FLOAT CREDITS SAFELY STUDIED BY DELEGATION

ABOARD S.S. "PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT," (at sea), June 3.—At a press conference today preceding another meeting of the American delegates to the World Economic Conference, Secretary of State Cordell Hull made a plea for resumption of foreign lending by the United States. He admitted that there was some "natural prejudice" in America against foreign loans, but insisted that losses on domestic bonds had exceeded by far the losses on foreign issues.

Secretary Hull hopes to encourage the resumption of international movements of capital through reduction of trade barriers and creation of world confidence by successful action at the economic conference. Formation of a special credit institution to promote the supplying of credit where urgently needed is one plan under study.

It has been suggested that such an institution could be linked with the Bank for International Settlements at Basle, but the world bank's connection with German reparations is a drawback. What governmental support Washington would give to an international credit institution is also questionable, and foreign suggestions of a governmental guaranty of such an institution's borrowings have not been acceptable.

The international credit bank which has been suggested would be designed to restart the world's economic machine by providing initial financing, contingent upon progress at the economic conference in the direction of reducing impediments to trade.

"Of the $17,000,000,000 of American foreign loans", Secretary Hull said today, "the losses in the depths of the panic were $9,000,000,000. At least $50,000,000,000 of domestic paper in the form of securities were issued with only water behind them and based on no physical values. Sound loans anywhere would be beneficial on the part of a country with large surpluses."

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask that as part of my remarks, the text of the silver treaty, which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] brought back from London, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The silver treaty is as follows:

TEXT OF SILVER AGREEMENT

LONDON, July 22.—The text of the agreement on monetary silver, signed tonight by eight nations attending the World Economic Conference, is as follows:

Memorandum of agreement entered into by the delegates of India, China, and Spain as holders of large stocks or users of silver and of Australia, Canada, the United States, Mexico, and Peru as the principal producers of silver at the Monetary and Economic Conference held in London, July 1933.

Whereas at the meeting of subcommission 2 (permanent measures) of the Monetary and Financial Commission of the Monetary and Economic Conference held Thursday, July 20, 1933, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Be it resolved to recommend to all governments parties to this conference—

"A. That agreement be sought between the chief silver-producing countries and those countries which are the largest holders or users of silver with a view to mitigating the fluctuations in the price of silver, and that other nations not parties to this agreement should refrain from measures which could appreciably affect the silver market;

"B. That governments parties to this conference shall refrain from new legislative measures which would involve further debasement of their silver coinage below a fineness of 800/1000;

"C. That they shall substitute silver coins for low-value paper currency insofar as the budgetary and local conditions of each country will permit;

"D. That all provisions of this resolution are subject to the following exceptions and limitations;

"Requirements that such provisions shall lapse April 1, 1934, if the agreement recommended in paragraph A does not come into force by that date; and in no case shall they extend beyond January 1, 1938;

"The governments may take any action relative to their silver coinage they deem necessary to prevent the flight or destruction of their silver coinage by reason of the rise in the bullion price of silver content in their coin above the normal or parity value of such silver coin; and

"Whereas the Governments of India and Spain may desire to sell a certain portion of their silver holdings, and it would be to their advantage that of the countries which are large producers of silver should absorb silver as herein provided to offset such sales; and

"Whereas it is to the advantage of the large producing countries named in article II (Australia, Canada, the United States, Mexico, and Peru) that the monetary sales of silver from monetary stocks should be limited as herein provided; and

"Whereas it is to the advantage of China that the sales from monetary stocks of silver be offset by the purchases as herein provided with a view to its effective stabilization;

"Now, therefore, it is agreed between the parties hereto:

"A. That the Government of India shall not dispose by sale of more than 140,000,000 fine ounces of silver during the period of 4 years commencing January 1, 1934. Disposals during each calendar year of the said 4-year period shall be based on an average of 35,000,000 fine ounces per year, it being understood, however, that if any year the Government of India shall not dispose of 35,000,000 fine ounces the difference between the amount actually disposed of and 35,000,000 fine ounces may be added as additional disposals in subsequent years.

"Provided further that the maximum amount disposed of in any year shall be limited to 50,000,000 fine ounces.

"B. Notwithstanding anything previously stated in this article, it is understood that if the Government of India should after the date of this agreement sell silver to any government for the purpose of transfer to the United States Government in payment of war debts, such silver shall be excluded from the scope of this agreement.

"C. Provided, however, that when the total of disposals referred to in paragraph A, above, plus the sales referred to in paragraph B above by the Government of India under this agreement shall amount to 175,000,000 fine ounces, the obligation of the parties hereto shall cease.

"II

"That the Governments of Australia, Canada, the United States, Mexico, and Peru during the existence of this agreement shall not sell any silver and shall also in the aggregate purchase or otherwise arrange for the withdrawing from the market 35,000,000 fine ounces of silver from the mine production of such countries in each calendar year for the period of 4 years commencing with the calendar year 1934. Said governments undertake to settle by agreement the share in said 35,000,000 fine ounces which each of them shall purchase or cause to be withdrawn.

"III

"That the silver purchased and withdrawn in accordance with article II above shall be used for currency purposes (either for coinage or for currency reserves) or be otherwise retained from sale during the said period of 4 years.

"IV

"That the Government of China shall not sell silver resulting from demonetized coins for a period of 4 calendar years commencing January 1, 1934.

"V

"That the Government of Spain shall not dispose by sale of more than 20,000,000 fine ounces of silver during the period of 4 years commencing January 1, 1934.

"Disposals during each calendar year of the said 4-year period shall be based on the average of 5,000,000 fine ounces per year; it being understood, however, that if, in any year, the Government of Spain shall not dispose of 5,000,000 fine ounces, the difference between the amount actually disposed of and 5,000,000 fine ounces may be added as additional disposals in subsequent years; provided further, that the maximum amount to be disposed of in any year shall be limited to 7,000,000 fine ounces.

"VI

"That the governments concerned will exchange all such information as may be necessary with regard to measures to fulfill the provisions of this memorandum of agreement.

"VII

"That it is understood that, subject to the provisions of article VIII, the undertakings of each party to the present memorandum are conditional upon the fulfillment of the undertakings of every other party thereto.

"VIII

"That this memorandum of agreement is subject to ratification by the governments concerned. Instruments of ratification shall be deposited not later than April 1, 1934, with the Government of the United States. It shall come into force as soon as the ratifications of all the governments concerned are received before April 1, 1934.

"Notice by any government that affirmative action necessary to carry out the purposes of this agreement has been taken will be accepted as an instrument of ratification. Nevertheless, if one or more of the governments enumerated in article II fail to ratify by April 1, 1934, the agreement shall come into force at that date if other governments mentioned in article II which have ratified notify the other governments which ratify that they are prepared to purchase or cause to be withdrawn an aggregate amount of silver mentioned in article II.

"The Government of the United States is requested to take such steps as may be necessary for the purpose of the conclusion of this agreement."

In witness whereof, the undersigned have signed the present memorandum of agreement. Done at London this 22d day of July 1933 in a single copy, which shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, more significant, perhaps, than any of the foregoing items may be the following dispatch from London by the Associated Press dated July 27, 1933:

COX SEES BIG ROLE FOR WORLD BANK—CALLS INSTITUTION VALUABLE MEANS FOR DEALING WITH INTERNATIONAL DEBTS

LONDON, July 27.—The Bank for International Settlements was upheld by James M. Cox, of Ohio, in a final address at the plenary session of the World Economic Conference today as providing a valuable means of dealing with the problem of international indebtedness and future extension of international credits.

Speaking as the president of the conference's monetary commission, the former Ohio Governor said that "We can easily foresee an entirely new order created by the Bank for International Settlements", which is in Basel, Switzerland.

"Of course, it can have no arbitrary powers in these matters", Mr. Cox said. "Its services are simply available if desired. If credits are to flow only to sound bases, the ultimate interests of the debtor will be advanced and unsound loans will be an exception. * * *"

No detailed outline of the part the Bank for International Settlements may play was given by Mr. Cox, but he said it would be an instrument of great value, and "It is my opinion that the Bank for International Settlements will, through its close contacts, give just the service necessary to keep the matter moving to a constantly improving status."

Mr. President, there is no need for me to dwell on the predilection of Mr. Cox for international alliances and entanglements. It is a matter of history that Mr. Cox, as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, went before the Nation in 1920 and championed the cause of the League of Nations. Hence it is in no way surprising that Mr. Cox reappears as the apostle of closer financial relations with the so-called "World Bank" at Basel, which, if not an adjunct of the League of Nations, is at present dominated by the same international group that dominates the League of Nations.

The question here is, Has the World Bank—as Mr. Cox suggested—"kept the matter moving to a constantly improving status", so that with but little information given to the rank and file of the American people we are now on the verge of entering upon a financial league of nations susceptible of a havoc almost as great as that which actual entry into the League would entail to the United States?

I do not profess to forecast the financial horoscope of an administration whose monetary policy seems to shift with each veering wind in the world commercial picture. But it is clear that the Senator from Nevada is still dangling before our eyes the picture of a redistribution or, better said, the "central control" of the world's gold, and presumably of the world's silver, for a few days ago—May 22, 1934, page 9215, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—in this Chamber Senator PITTMAN informed us:

Mr. PITTMAN. There is the problem of gold redistribution which, of course, is in the mind of everyone. Exactly when that will be worked out so that it will be safe to part with the gold, and it will be known that there will be no danger of loss, the redistribution of gold must take place, and in connection with that redistribution there must then be more or less a redistribution of silver. It is totally impossible for us now, at least for me, to visualize ahead what may happen to both gold and silver in the next few years; but the purpose or intent of the President is clearly in mind, and I think no one whatever doubts it.

As to the purpose of the President that we may assume, I suppose, was indicated in his statement to the Congress of that same day—May 22:

However, because of the great world supply of silver and its use in varying forms by the world's population, concerted action by all nations, or at least a large group of nations, is necessary if a permanent measure of value, including both gold and silver, is eventually to be made a world standard.

To arrive at this point we must seek every possibility for world agreement, although it may turn out that this Nation will ultimately have to take such independent action on this phase of the matter as its interests require.

The success of the London Conference in consummating an international agreement on silver which has now been ratified by all the governments concerned makes such further agreement worth seeking * * *. Accordingly, I have begun to confer with some of our neighbors in regard to the use of both silver and gold, preferably on a coordinate basis, as a standard of monetary value.

Such an agreement would constitute an important step forward toward a monetary unit of value more equitable and stable in its purchasing and debt-paying power.

Mr. President, it will be recalled that the World Trade Conference in London in 1933 was wrecked on the so-called "question of de facto" currency stabilization. Nowhere have I seen the underlying issues stated more clearly than they were by President Albert Lebrun, of France, on July 2 of that year. I quote him:

France is maintaining that the determining element in a return to normal life lies in a reestablishment of confidence and security in all domains, political, economic, monetary, and social.

This self-evident truth must be admitted: That stability of money, which is a common element in human transactions, is imperiously necessary. But how can contracts be made and engagements signed on a monetary basis that varies with events and speculations? To speak of tariff adjustments while moneys are variable is pure Utopia. Those nations with stabilizing currencies cannot accept such projects.

The rise in prices that is sought would necessarily follow the organization of production. It is not certain that it can be brought about by those artificial measures that some recommend despite the disaster of recent experience, such as monetary devalorization, inflation of credits, and exaggerated international loans.

Mr. President, that was the picture as drawn by the distinguished Frenchman a year ago, on the eve of the dramatic break-up of the London Conference. Since then we have devalued our gold dollar, but the great predicted stimulation of exports and increase in prices of farm products has not followed. Now, seemingly, we are preparing to return to a modified, reformed, or some sort of gold standard.

In order, however, to complete our review of the monetary events of the last year, it is necessary to advert to the RECORD, briefly. On May 16, 1933, the President sent to the assembling 54 nations at London the following message:

The World Economic Conference will meet soon and must come to conclusions quickly. The world cannot await deliberations long drawn out. The conference must establish order in place of the present chaos by a stabilization of currencies, by freeing the flow of world trade, and by international action to raise the price levels. It must, in short, supplement individual domestic programs for economic recovery by wise and considered international action.

However, on July 3, 1933, after the conference had collapsed, the President sent this message:

So, too, old fetishes of so-called "international bankers" are being replaced by efforts to plan national currencies with the objective of giving to those currencies a continuing purchasing power which does not greatly vary in terms of the commodities and needs of modern civilization.

Let us be frank in saying that the United States seeks the kind of dollar which a generation hence will have the same purchasing power and debt-paying power as the dollar value we hope to attain in the near future. That objective means more to the good of other nations than a fixed ratio for a month or two in terms of the pound or franc.

Our broad purpose is permanent stabilization of every nation's currency—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I shall not venture to place my own interpretation upon the foregoing seemingly conflicting utterances of the Chief Executive with regard to the somewhat disconcerting events at London. We read, however, amidst contemporaneous comment, the following editorial from the New York Times of July 4, 1933:

A CONFUSING STATEMENT

President Roosevelt's latest message to and about the World Economic Conference leaves behind it a trail of guesses. No one at London, not even in the American delegation, appears to know exactly what the President meant and intends.

He speaks of the catastrophe amounting to a world tragedy which would be involved in having the world conference turn from its real purposes in order to take up proposals about the monetary exchange of a few nations only.

But who put the questions of foreign exchange and currency stabilization in the forefront of the program for the conference? President Roosevelt himself. It was the very first item on the list when he appealed to the governments on May 16 (1933) to bring about conclusion at London quickly.

He then definitely declared "the conference must establish order in place of the present chaos by a stabilization of currencies."

It must naturally puzzle somewhat the untutored minds of Europeans to find Mr. Roosevelt now speaking of his own proposal, less than 2 months ago, as among the fetishes of the so-called "international bankers.'"

Mr. President, I venture the remark that the confusion over the American monetary policy, to which the editor of the Times so pointedly alludes, is still existent in the minds of many people.

Notwithstanding the unhappy denouement of the London Conference, we are now being asked to proceed upon another foreign adventure in currency stabilization.

In order to prepare the way for that stabilization, the President and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] ask us to consent to the admission of more silver into our monetary reserves, with no indication whatever, so far as I know, as to whether or not we are to embark on a policy of bimetallism.

Of course, under the Thomas amendment, the President at any time may proclaim and promulgate, by a mere executive edict, a fixed ratio between gold and silver.

I believe, Mr. President, I have conservatively depicted a background for all these monetary maneuvers, both in the domestic and the foreign field—one that should make us pause for reflection.

If, as would seem indicated, we are to be invited to join a financial league of nations, pledging American gold and American silver to support a hodge-podge of foreign currencies of all nations on the face of the globe; if we are to be asked to link ourselves with the World Bank for International Settlements, at Basle, then I think that in all fairness and justice, the Senate of the United States ought to be informed of what is going on and what is intended before we pass this legislation.

Formerly it was the duty of the Congress to coin money and fix the value thereof. Indeed, it is my modest opinion that we shall never attain our former state of prosperity until we do return to the gold standard, and by that I mean the issuance of gold-backed notes that are redeemable at the holder's wish.

If our gold reserve is to be earmarked or impounded for the account of the world bank at Basle, I think that we ought to be frankly and promptly informed of that fact.

We hear it remarked on every side that the hand of the average American is denied the right to touch a single gold eagle; that gold must be reserved as bullion for use of international bank and bankers, for the settlement of international trade balances; and, indeed, that silver must be added to this enormous stock of metal so that whatever international paper currency may be based on this international pool will circulate in the United States, in China, India, and South America, as well as in the treasuries of Europe.

What a fantasy. Mr. President, did we learn no lesson whatever from the League of Nations? When that magnificent international dream proved illusory, what can we expect from such a plan as this?

Mr. President, in my opinion, should the United States Government ever consent to any formal connection with the world bank, by pledging our financial reserves, either by earmarking or actual impoundment, it would open up a siphon for American money flowing to Europe, such as we could never stop.

At the very least, it would seem that the Senate is entitled to some explanation of what is going on behind the scenes in the way of further international compacts before we again delegate our constitutional obligation and responsibility to the executive branch of our Government.

Now, that Congress has delegated tariff responsibility to the President, and is about to delegate additional monetary power also to him, we have a dictatorship conclusive and complete over American commerce and trade and the destiny of the American people.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes.

MONETARY USE AND PURCHASE OF SILVER

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 9745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, under the arrangement, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was to speak for an indefinite time, to be arranged later.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the debate on this bill has taken a wider range by far than the bill itself might justify. I hope later to have something to say as to my view of the effect of the measure itself, but I desire at the present time to offer some observations touching the general subject of silver, particularly as it affects trade.

It may be, Mr. President, that the Senator from Ohio and others who share his opinion are correct as to their view as to silver, that the solution of our monetary problem does not lie in that direction. That is not my view; but, nevertheless, I am willing to concede, for the purpose of the argument, for the time being, that that view is sound. I ask those, however, who say that the solution does not lie in that direction to consider the question, Where does the solution lie? I do not think that anyone can satisfy himself that the solution lies in the restoration of the gold standard as it existed prior to the World War. There must be some other solution than that. We have had until lately the single gold standard for nearly a century and the results are all about us.

It is estimated at the present time that the indebtedness of the United States is $210,000,000,000. It is estimated that the world's indebtedness is something over $400,000,000,000. This increase in debt has been accumulating for the last 75 years particularly, and to some extent during the last 100 years.

It is now estimated that our taxes have during the last quarter of a century increased by something like 300 percent, and we are fast moving to the point, so it is estimated, where the national income will be exceeded by the national outlay.

It is also stated, upon good authority, that at the present time 4 percent of the people of the United States own 80 percent of its wealth. That same ratio obtains in all leading countries. This is not the result of the last 25 years; this is the result, as shown by facts and figures, of the drift of the last 75 or 100 years.

At the present time it is also stated, upon authority that seems reliable, that 80 percent of the people of the world are living below the poverty line. That is not a result of the World War alone; that is a condition which has been accumulating and growing for the last 100 years.

Forty million people of the United States would now be close to hunger and want if it were not for the hand of charity. At the present time there is unrest in almost every quarter of the globe, manifested by strikes, protests in different ways, and it cannot be said that there is now anything like rest or contentment or even hope among the great body and masses of the people.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, and notwithstanding these facts and figures, the earth has continued to be bountiful, and we have more of the things that people need in the way of food and clothing than at any other time in the history of the world. At the present time food production and the production of clothes and other necessaries of life have lagged behind very little compared to the most prosperous days; but in the midst of that condition of plenty there are hunger and nakedness and despair, insanity, and suicide, as a result of the conditions which confront us. If I thought that situation was the result of the World War, I would take an entirely different view of the outlook, but I know from history, from facts, and from figures that it is a condition which has been growing for the past hundred years. Gradually wealth is passing into the hands of a very few people; the great body and masses of the people are living upon a lower line. This is due to a fundamental trend. I know of no factor so dominant in creating such a trend as the monetary systems of the world.

Owen D. Young, speaking a few nights ago before the students of the University of Nebraska, delivered what seemed to me to be a very remarkable address, one which we can all read with benefit. He said in this address that our laws, our banking system, and, by inference, our monetary system had not kept pace with the other developments of the world.

There is a strong belief among the leaders in all lines of thought that in some way there must be found a different system from that which now prevails. In my opinion, the present conditions of the world are due to two great contributing causes, the single gold standard and war. I think the single gold standard has worked from the beginning for the concentration of wealth, for the impoverishment of the masses, for the enrichment of the few. These things were accentuated by war, particularly the World War; but whether war is in progress or whether war is at an end, that trend and that tendency go on apace. For more than a hundred years there has prevailed a system of restriction as to money.

In 1816 Great Britain established a single gold standard. There has been a difference of view as to why Great Britain established the single gold standard. It does not seem to me there need be very much dispute about it. Her able statesmen declared the purpose at the time. They were interested in buying raw materials, and they desired cheap raw materials. They were preparing to become the creditor nation of the world, and they were interested in the augmentation of the values of securities. Therefore, they adopted a policy, with reference to the monetary system of Great Britain, which would have the direct effect of accomplishing those two ends. It was the first great step in this policy of restriction of making primary money scarce.

In 1871 Germany followed in the establishment of the single gold standard. She had for years been using the gold and silver standard; but after the war with France, in which a tribute of some billion dollars was laid upon France, it seemed to be to the interest of Germany to increase the value of her tribute, and she adopted the single gold standard, demonetizing silver, another effort to make money scarce in order to augment the value of a certain kind of wealth.

After the Civil War, men who had purchased the bonds during the war for 50 to 60 cents on the dollar came to the conclusion that they desired to have them paid in specie, and it was so provided. Thaddeus Stevens denounced it as a crime against the people of the United States. But not satisfied with that, in 1873 the purchasers of those bonds became interested in having them paid in gold alone, and silver was demonetized in the United States. Since that time the world has practically been upon a single gold standard.

Mr. President, beginning with 1816 the conditions which we now have begun to disclose in a limited way, growing with the years until today, as I said a moment ago, about 4 percent of the people of the world own 80 percent of its wealth, and 80 percent of the people of the world are living below the poverty line.

It may be that silver is not the solution of the problem, but is anyone prepared to face the future in view of what has happened in the past hundred years with the single gold standard? With $210,000,000,000 of national and private indebtedness, 70 percent of which is payable in gold, with $400,000,000,000 of indebtedness of the world, 60 percent at least of which is payable in gold, with $11,500,000,000 or $12,000,000,000 of gold upon which to base the monetary system, does anyone believe we can administer the governments of the world with a monetary system based upon gold?

It has been said that the bill now before us will not solve the problem.

Mr. President, let us move away today from those who it is claimed may be interested for selfish reasons and take the view, the arguments, and the reasons of those who are wholly disconnected with the production of silver. Let us view it from the standpoint of world trade and of the conditions which confront the Occident in its present contest with the Orient in the production of the things in which the world now needs. I want as a text to read a single sentence from a statement made by the President on January 15, 1934. Speaking of silver he said:

> It is such a crucial factor in so much of the world's international trade that it cannot be neglected.

Silver is a crucial factor in the world's international trade. So long as it is used by people in the Orient who now use it even at its degraded value, it becomes an important and determining factor in the contest between the Orient and the Occident with reference to trade. I have no doubt that the President in considering the silver question was considering it as a factor, as he said, in the matter of international trade.

I read a paragraph from the Journal of the Chamber of Commerce of London upon the same subject:

> In the April issue of this journal last year the view expressed by the London Times was reaffirmed, "that there is no way out of the crisis under the present monetary system, and that the sooner this is recognized the less avoidable misery there will be." It is anticipated that it will probably be necessary to say it again in the April issue of next year, but thereafter it will not be necessary, because the process of disintegration will by that time have gone so far that even the most obstinately blind will be forced to see it, and the man who advocated a return to the gold standard would probably be treated as a museum piece. He would be regarded as on a par with the man who inveighed against the internal-combustion engine and expatiated upon the greater advantages of the dear old donkey cart.
> What would the average manufacturer do if he were told that, however large his daily output might be, those who had the sole monopoly of the means of transport were unable to supply him with more than a dozen donkey carts per day in which to transport his products? Further, that they would rather see him and all his employees die of starvation than allow him to use such thoroughly unsound and dangerous new contraptions as railway wagons? And yet this is exactly the ludicrous cause of the world's miseries at the present time.
> It is evident that all that human beings need are food, clothes, houses, motor cars, ships, etc., and that real wealth consists in the ability to produce and enjoy these things; that these things are or could be available in vast abundance, but that, instead of men being able to enjoy them in increasing measure, the contrary is, in fact, the case.
> The reason for this is that a decreasing number of people are being given the tokens (money) with which to claim this abundance, although money, qua money, is worth nothing and has for the last 20 years been created by the banks in this country by the simple process of writing figures in books and lending the result at interest. * * *
> Only by a sane monetary system, nationally and internationally, will it be possible to solve this and the other problems which are now exercising the minds of all thinking men, and to eliminate such scandals as the destruction of food whilst people starve—scandals which have shocked the conscience of mankind.

Truly so, Mr. President. As a solution of the awful conditions which now confronts us it is proposed to continue to reduce production, to destroy food, instead of providing a means, a method, a medium of exchange by which to transfer it from those who have it to those who are hungering for it.

This is a statement from the Chamber of Commerce of London.

Sir Henry Deterding said some days ago:

> We are passing through a period during which the public, treating the most important features with the utmost superficiality, is unfortunately far too ready to take the easiest explanation as a true reflection of the position.

Everywhere one hears people talking about overproduction, while after taking only a little bit of trouble and examining facts it is more than clear that what is considered to be overproduction is not only underconsumption but a "manufactured" underconsumption; and, further, it is a fact that those who for selfish purposes created this are the loudest in supporting and spreading the cry of overproduction, and (consequently) in calling for a restriction of production.

Sir Henry Deterding enters upon a discussion of the silver question, of the necessity for restoring silver in order to restore and help build up world trade.

Let me call attention to the fact that we are now about to engage in a search for world trade, to build up world trade. Where are we going to find the world trade? We are not going to get very much from Great Britain, certainly not for our farmers, because the brilliant gentleman who is at the head of that department in England said a few days ago that he was going to ask even Australia and Canada to cease sending their farm products to England, as he was engaged in building up the agricultural interests of England. We are not going to get it from France. We are not going to get it from Germany. The demand for the things which we have lies in that region of the world where over half the human race reside, where they have no medium of exchange, no means of measuring their debts and credits. If we are ever to find world trade of moment, we must find it after purchasing power has been restored to more than one-half the human race. We shall find it, not in England or Germany or in France but, as Sir Henry Deterding says, in these regions of the world where more than half the human family live, and where the greed of the moneyed interests of the world has destroyed the only medium of exchange which they have.

Something was said by the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] in regard to India. I desire to read from the Daily Gazette, published in India, a statement from Sir Montague Webb. It seems that he had sent a telegram to the President of the United States stating that the people of India were in favor of restoring silver as legal-tender money. He was asked:

Why are you approaching President Roosevelt direct at this particular moment?

Said he:

Because the general level of prices is once more dropping, both in the United Kingdom and India—

And, except where artificially sustained, in the United States. The price level is again on the downward trend practically all throughout the civilized world—in India, in Great Britain, in the United States—except where it is sustained by artificial means—and Government appears to be taking no action whatever to save the situation except calling local conferences, talking about "planning", and importing a marketing expert, all of which involve a sheer waste of money, without the slightest chance of raising prices and encouraging a return of prosperity. Only reopened mints through which the public can obtain purchasing tools without having to borrow and pay interest on them can save the situation now.

England has defaulted in its annual debt payment to the United States of America, and Mr. Chamberlain has the hardihood to tell world audiences * * * that he has produced an admirable return-to-prosperity budget! But what England and France and Germany have done other countries, including India, and many private businesses and individuals will be forced to do, unless Government wakes up and saves the situation by remonetizing silver. If all-round repudiation of debt is the road to prosperity, then we are on that road now, and God help the bankers! Surely raising world prices by remonetizing silver would be a far better road. Then let us take it.

But we are told, Mr. President, when these conditions are presented and these facts and figures are at hand, that we do not need more money; all we need is confidence. I notice that the bankers in Indiana met the other day; they recognized the condition in the United States—the overindebtedness, the unemployment, the stagnation of business—but they said, "What we want is not more money but confidence."

It is a grim piece of humor when the bankers meet and say that what we want is confidence. We might just as well say to a man who is out on a raft in the ocean, which a storm is breaking up hour by hour, "What you need is not a means of transportation back to the land but confidence", as to say, "What you need is not a medium of exchange but confidence."

Confidence can never be restored so long as commodity prices are continually falling. If there is anything that destroys faith, confidence, and hope, it is the constant sliding down of the prices of commodities throughout a country or throughout the world. How can we stop the fall of prices except by enlarging the amount of primary money in the volume of circulation?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] spoke the other day about 1896 and about what brought back prosperity. I have been looking at some figures, and I find that immediately following the depression of 1896 we imported from Alaska something like $300,000,000 of gold. We were at that time selling to Russia, and immediately thereafter we imported from Russia on the basis of our exports something like $300,000,000 of gold. In other words, we increased the primary money of the country to the extent of some $600,000,000 in a very short time. It was as a result of that increase that prices began to go up, commodity prices began to rise; and as soon as they do begin to go up, as soon as they do begin to rise, that gives confidence. That causes men to make long-time contracts. That gives hope; that gives faith; and it is the only thing that will give it.

It is all right to appropriate large sums of money to keep people from starving. There can be no criticism of it; but every man knows that so long as we have to take care of our people by appropriations out of the Public Treasury it is dangerous to engage in long-time business contracts. The only thing which would justify the hope or the faith which leads to long-time contracts, to building, to improvements, and so forth, is when people see the price of commodities rise.

I ask Senators who are present to tell me a single instance in which a great world depression resulted from the fall of commodity prices where that depression was cured or that price fall was arrested in any other way than by increasing the volume of the circulating medium.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps the bankers have the idea, which is no doubt very well founded; that the banks are full of money; that there is plenty of money in the country; that there is plenty of credit in the country; and their thought is that, by increasing the supply of money, we do not necessarily decrease the commodity prices, because they say there is plenty of money here now. That is their argument—that the banks are full of money.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if all the wealth of the world were coined into dollars and cents, and were buried in some cellar, it would not do the people of the world any good, and it might be just as well buried in a cellar as to be buried in the vaults of banks if the banks are afraid to put it out.

Mr. President, one of the most startling things in the world of trade today is the extent to which the Orient is invading the Occident with its goods, its products, its manufactured stuff. In London, in the United States, in Italy, and throughout the world they are now invading the occidental markets in such a way that it is almost impossible to meet the competition, even by embargo tariffs. The difference between the cost of production in the Occident and in the Orient, owing to cheap labor and to cheap silver in the latter, is something like 300 percent.

Suppose we raise tariffs 50 percent; what protection is afforded against the manufacture which comes in at a cost of production one-third of the cost of production in the Occident?

I noticed yesterday in the New York Times, in the financial section of the paper, this statement:

For the first time in history the western world is keenly feeling the industrial competition from the Far East. This competition, according to those who have made a close study of the situation, reflects lower production costs in the Far East due to a lower wage scale, comparable mechanization which has been imported from the occidental nations, and the low price for silver and the Japanese yen, which because of the proximity of Japan to China and other silver countries, is closely wedded to silver.

In an effort to throttle this competition virtually all of the important industrial nations of Europe and the United States have raised their tariff barriers against goods produced in the Orient. Only recently England took steps in that direction which had been preceded by the United States and Germany. While the raising of tariff barriers has been reasonably effective in keeping Japanese and Chinese manufactured articles out of the countries which have taken this step, the result has been that these goods have found a market in other countries formerly supplied with these articles by the occidental nations.

Because of this condition the raising of tariff barriers does not solve the question.

Mr. President, at the present time we are having great difficulty with cotton manufactures of the United States. A few days ago the cotton manufacturers averted a strike. They are living on the ragged edge of bankruptcy. That is true in India, it is true in Lancashire, England, while the cotton manufacturers of Shanghai, of China, and of Japan are paying in some instances 25-percent dividends upon their stock.

What are we to do about it? Are we to continue to leave them in possession of a cheap money, which, together with the cheap labor, makes tariff legislation perfectly futile? I ask those who are interested in cotton manufacturers in the United States how they are going to meet that competition.

I might take any one of a dozen other articles, so far as that is concerned, as to which the same competition exists and the same success in taking away the markets of these occidental countries prevails. Unless we are prepared to cease our activities along certain lines and give over the markets to these people, we must necessarily meet the difficulty by dealing with the monetary question. It was for that reason that the President of the United States said upon the 15th day of January that the silver problem is a controlling problem in international trade.

It was said a few nights ago by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Hoover's administration that we should return to the gold standard. Return to the gold standard and further appreciate the purchasing power of gold? Return to the gold standard and leave the oriental countries in absolute control of a great number of manufactures which employ millions of people in the United States, Great Britain, and Italy?

To enlarge or deepen our unemployment problem, no more successful way could be found than to return to the gold standard, appreciate the purchasing power of gold, leave silver at its low ebb, and, with cheap labor and cheap silver, the oriental countries will take possession of the markets of the Occident.

Mr. President, I was told recently by a gentleman who had been traveling in England of instance after instance in London where he witnessed the fact that Japanese goods were pushing the goods of Great Britain out of the windows of the stores. Are we prepared to meet that, or are we content to let it go forward?

Mr. President, let us disregard for a few moments the silver producers of the West, and the fact that some miner in the West might reap some benefit from this proposition, and let us view the larger question; that is, how the Occident is going to compete with the Orient in further world trade. Where are we to get the world trade for which we are searching?

Mr. President, I referred briefly to Mr. Montague Webb's study of India, which he denominates "India's Plight." I wish to read a paragraph or two from that statement. Mr. Webb has given years and years of his life to a study of the India question in connection with silver. He reviews at length the condition among the India people, the universal distress and misery which prevail, which have deepened and accentuated during the last few years. He gives facts and figures which I suspect are not subject to controversy. He states:

Be the first and secondary causes of the present catastrophe what they may, the widespread loss of confidence and shrinkage of trade are directly caused by falling prices. And falling prices are the direct consequence of the policy of monetary restriction initiated in London in 1918–19, and extended from London, through the agency of the bankers, to all parts of the British Empire, and of the world.

Then he quotes from Mr. Arthur Kitson, who criticized the action of the British bankers at the time in restricting money. He said:

To forcibly control the currency, as suggested by the committee (the Cunliffe committee) will check production, destroy confidence, render reconstruction undertakings difficult if not impossible, and probably lead the way to very serious social and political disorder.

To restrict currency is to point the way to madness.

That took place in 1919, when the London bankers began their system of restriction of money in an effort to accomplish one of their purposes, force India on the gold standard, demonetize silver, and destroy the rupee.

I can understand those who believe that the gold standard is better for the United States or Great Britain or Germany. I can appreciate the fact that if we had from eleven and a half to twelve million dollars of gold and could properly distribute it, it might be sufficient to take care of those countries. But to take from the 300,000,000 people in India, 400,000,000 people in China, and some 250,000,000 people in other parts of the world similarly situated, who have no gold, can secure no gold, who have no paper, and cannot use paper, and who have no banking system, their primary money, silver, constitutes a crime which there is no language to describe.

Again Sir Montague Webb said:

In view of the fact that India, China, and the rest of Asia, together with the peoples of the tropics, and many peoples of semitropical lands on both sides of the equator all around the globe—in short, one-half of the population of the world—are already using money made of silver and are quite contented with that money, what are we to think of the mental equipment and outlook of the "high" financial authorities of the West, who, with four-fifths of the available gold in the world out of action, now deliberately legislate against the silver money at present in use in India, with the special object of linking India and the rest of the world with a paper monetary system in Great Britain which high finance will control—if it can!

Again he said:

Is India going to accept lying down this attempt at financial dominance from the West in every detail of its daily life? Listen to what President Roosevelt said on this subject in his first Presidential address:

"We cannot allow our economic life to be controlled by that small group of men whose chief outlook upon the social welfare is tinctured by the fact that they may make huge profits from the lending of money and the marketing of securities—an outlook which deserves the adjectives 'selfish' and 'opportunist.'"

That is a quotation from the President.

We must necessarily depend upon a restoration of world trade in order to secure world recovery.

About 270,000,000 people in England, in the United States—or rather the Government—and in France, own or control 80 percent of all the gold in the world. Here are 270,000,000 people in control of 80 percent of the gold of the world. Outside of that are about 1,600,000,000 people upon whom we must rely if we are going to restore world prosperity or world trade.

Mr. President, France and the United States cannot possibly be prosperous, cannot have trade and prosper if we are going to leave 1,600,000,000 people of the world living under the poverty line.

The silver question as a question of international exchange, of international trade, becomes a problem of the first order. Facts and circumstances force it upon us. We must consider it; we cannot pass it by. It turns up in our invaded markets and demands consideration.

Here is an item which I overlooked in connection with the transferring of the trade of the Occident to the Orient. This is under the London date line of March 27.

BRITISH EQUIPMENT FOR CANTON—MACHINERY FOR TWO TEXTILE MILLS BEING SHIPPED

LONDON, March 27.—It was learned today that the Platt Bros. & Co., at Oldham, are dispatching complete equipment for two textile mills to Canton on March 29. The equipment includes everything necessary for a 10,000-spindle cotton-spinning and weaving mill, and also for a 1,200-spindle woolen mill. The machines for both mills have all the latest improvements for high production and easy manipulation. Several Chinese mechanics, who have been in Lancashire studying the construction of the machines, will superintend their erection.—Reuter.

But the capital is furnished by British capitalists.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I seek from the Senator from Idaho information which I am sure the eminent Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who has heretofore spoken, and the eminent Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who has given such great research to the study of the silver question, could give. I invite the Senator from Idaho to recall, if I be not in error, that when Sir Robert Peel presented his measure which created a value to what would be called the pound in gold, one of the things stated in the presentation by Sir Robert Peel as a reason for insisting that gold should then be adopted in England and the very high price be paid for that which we speak of as the pound, was that there was not silver accessible for the purpose, for whatever he had in mind, for that which has been discussed by those preceding me in debate.

I ask the Senator from Idaho, What says the Senator from Idaho as to whether the policy he advocates should be adopted—that which the able Senators to whom I just alluded have concurred in—is America in a position to furnish silver sufficient to meet demands in order to produce the rise in these falling prices?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my opinion is that should we undertake to utilize silver as fully as may be under this bill we are going to be disappointed in the amount of silver which we are able to obtain. This idea of a flood of silver coming in from different parts of the world does not seem to me to be sustained by facts or figures. I think that ultimately, if the United States moves out in this matter and puts the Government behind the silver cause, it will bring about an agreement between the leading nations of the world for the use of silver.

I have always believed in an international agreement for the reestablishment of silver. I thought it was the safe and the sound way. But my opinion is that unless the United States takes the lead in a drastic and determined way, the other nations will not come to the support of silver, certainly not as readily as they will if the United States does take the lead.

Mr. President, this measure is not all that some of us desire. It does not give silver the place in our monetary system which some of us feel it must ultimately have. It does not give it the quality of redemption money, such as silver possessed from the beginning of world history until that quality was taken away by affirmative legislation. The measure, I feel, will not have the effect on prices that it would have if the silver were restored to its ancient place in our monetary system.

But it is all that can be secured at this time. Its passage will make the next move for the restoration of silver less difficult. I regret the delay, but it could not be avoided, and the thing for the supporters of silver to do is to accept this measure and move on to the next fight.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I discussed at some length this morning the various aspects of the so-called "silver question" and attempted an analysis of the bill under consideration. I attempted to show that this measure is one of great importance and will improve our monetary system and pave the way for the restoration of silver to the high station which it occupied prior to its demonetization.

I desire to submit now a few general observations which I think are germane to the consideration of the bill before us.

In my opinion only the most reactionary and thoroughgoing gold monometallists can find any pretext for not supporting the bill under consideration. Since the demonetization of silver by Great Britain in 1816, there have been powerful forces among financial and banking interests and among selfish and greedy creditors, which have endeavored to limit the basic money of the world in order that they might more easily control it and thus control prices and, indeed, the economic and industrial life of the people. When silver was stricken down one-half of the springs that gave life and vitality to business and industry were destroyed. Many writers have likened the uses and purposes of metallic money to the life-giving functions of the vital fluid within the veins of human beings.

It is conceded that gold and silver performed the functions of money for thousands of years; that the ratio of production during many, many centuries was substantially 12 to 1, and that an increase in the production of these metals stimulated trade and commerce and contributed to the prosperity and welfare of the people. The statement cannot successfully be challenged, that it was selfishness and greed that led to the demonetization of silver. The monetary system of this Republic rested upon a metallic base consisting of gold and silver. The demonetization of silver in the United States was not the result of a demand by the people but was a surreptitious accomplishment, the evil consequences of which were not fully understood by the American people for a number of years.

The gold standard has proven inadequate to meet the legitimate and proper monetary demands. It has been a failure. Its wrecks are found in every land. It has ruined individuals and communities and spread woe and sorrow throughout the world. One would suppose that with this tragic record there would be a universal demand for silver's rehabilitation and for the establishment and maintenance of a monetary system under which there would be reasonable financial security and a level of prices which would assure business security and industrial and economic advancement. However, it seems as if the lessons of history have not been learned.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], in an able address, occupying several hours in duration, attempted to defend the gold standard and a policy which excluded the restoration of silver to its proper monetary position. Evidently he speaks for the Republican Party. That view is strengthened by the statement of the distinguished Republican leader in the Senate [Mr. MCNARY], who stated but a day or two ago that the paramount issues of the campaign were "honest money", obviously meaning gold monometallism, and the tariff. That standard bearer of Republicanism, former Secretary Mills, of New York, in an address delivered on Friday evening last, announced the Republican creed in language quite reminiscent of reactionary and orthodox statements emanating from such former stalwart Republicans as Senators Boies Penrose, Matthew Quay, Grundy, of Pennsylvania, and other distinguished and valiant apostles of Republicanism whose services have been so greatly appreciated by that party.

It appears that our Republican friends are satisfied with the wreckage caused by the gold standard, and the financial policies which have prevailed since the demonetization of silver. Certainly they cannot look with any degree of satisfaction upon a world overwhelmed with debt; with billions of dollars of obligations resting upon nations, States, corporations, and individuals. They cannot view with any degree of complacency the evidences of international and individual bankruptcy. One would suppose that the catastrophic decline in commodity prices throughout the world would awaken them from their condition of lethargy, and from a laissez faire attitude, and compel a reexamination of the financial policies resting upon gold monometallism, that have wrought such havoc throughout the world. But it is apparent that, like the Bourbons of old, many have learned nothing from experience and are going forward recklessly in defense of the gold standard,

Obviously, the gold standard is not entitled to the claim of being sound money. Its gyrations, its rise and fall, have demonstrated conclusively that as a basis for credit and currency, it is uncertain and even dangerous. A standard of values, a "measuring rod", as some are pleased to call gold, becomes a cheat and fraud when it produces the results which have attended the operations of the gold standard as the sole monetary base. It has fluctuated more than silver ever fluctuated. Any graph presenting the relation of gold to commodities, to real and personal property, and to wages demonstrates what an unfair, uncertain, and, indeed, fraudulent standard is presented by gold. So inadequate has it been to meet the demands of trade and commerce and the needs of the people, that most of the nations of the world have been compelled to abandon it.

Even Great Britain and the United States have left the gold standard; and throughout the world there is a growing feeling that a return to the gold standard with the monumental debts now resting upon the world would only multiply the sorrows and evils through which the world is now passing. Billions of national and individual indebtedness are payable in gold; and it is absolutely impossible for the world to meet these colossal debts. The incomes of the people are not sufficient to pay interest installments and amortization charges. A return to prosperity under the gold standard is impossible. Any forcible attempts to compel the payment of these obligations mean bankruptcy. Improvement can only come when the national purchasing power is increased, and purchasing power will result only when the peoples of the world are enjoying profitable employment. It is indispensable that the price level be raised.

Various commissions have, during the past few years, made investigations for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of the world depression, and all, whether gold monometallists or bimetallists or paper inflationists, have declared that the price level, for commodities and human toil, must be raised if the world is to be relieved from the mountain of debt resting upon it. Senators will recall the report of the British commission called the "McMillan Commission." Probably that is one of the ablest studies of the financial and economic condition that has been made. This language is found in the report:

> We are emphatically of the opinion that even if a further fall of wholesale prices be avoided, stabilization at approximately the present level would be a serious disaster for all countries of the world alike; and the avoidance of such an event should be a prime objective of international statesmanship. Consequently, even the continuance of the present price level must prolong business losses and unemployment. Governments and central banks will be blamed. Social unrest will tend to make moderate and rational remedies more difficult the longer they are delayed. Our objective should be, insofar as it lies with the power of this country, to influence the international price level; first of all to raise prices above the present level and then to maintain them at the level thus reached, with as much stability as can be managed. We recommend that this objective be accepted as the guiding aim of the monetary policy of this country.

It will be remembered that most of these debts were incurred when commodity prices were at a higher level and that the fall of prices has resulted in doubling and, in many instances, trebling the obligations, so that debtors are required to pay double or treble in property and in labor above that required to meet the obligations at the time they were contracted: It is obvious that the gold standard has been a cruel master, and any attempt to meet its obligations would mean increased poverty and universal ruin.

It is imperative that the world price of gold measured by goods and services must be lowered, which, in other words, means that the world price level must be raised. The international price level, no matter how self-contained or nationalistic a country may be, influences prices in such country and in all countries. Domestic price levels are influenced by international price levels, and foreign exchanges in their operations affect domestic and world prices. The price of wheat or cotton is fixed by the world, and, generally speaking, the world prices determine domestic prices directly or indirectly. Money affects the daily lives of the people of the world, and obviously if the supply is inadequate to meet the demands of trade and commerce, it becomes a varying and an unjust measuring rod.

Lands, houses, commodities—all are measured by money. Value is purchasing power, and without purchasing power values disappear, bringing down upon the heads of the peoples the wreck of a structure which they have sought to erect.

The deflation which has come to the world is in part due to the failure of the gold standard to meet human needs, and those who controlled the gold have viewed too often with complacency the ruin which deflation has wrought. Deflation brought about a rise in the price of gold because of its scarcity and the catastrophic decline in the prices of all commodities.

Mr. L. F. Amry, a distinguished Member of Parliament and at one time a Cabinet officer, declared that—

> The trouble is there is a type of mind still very influential which while only too ready to recognize the power of monetary influences to create inflation, regard deflation however violent and however disastrous as a mysterious, beneficent process, which it is unwise to question and dishonest to interfere with.

The efforts of gold-standard countries to maintain a reasonably stable price level have been unsuccessful. Great Britain, since leaving the gold standard, has endeavored to control world prices by anchoring them to sterling exchange. She has sought to maintain her commercial supremacy in the world, to increase her exports, and to maintain reasonably stable price levels at home. Sir Arthur Salter, however, has said that a country can combine several ambitions successfully—

> But four she cannot achieve simultaneously: She cannot be a creditor from the past, a reluctant importer, a great exporter, and a reluctant lender of new money.

Great Britain may not accomplish these four results. I submit that a metallic base adequate for the needs of the world is essential if there shall be reasonable stability in the price level. Extreme fluctuations result in chaotic conditions in domestic as well as in international business relations. Perhaps 75 to 85 percent of the world's population is interested in maintaining stable international exchange. The gold standard has failed in this respect. It has forced lower price levels. Undoubtedly the gold policy of Great Britain has had for one of its objects lower world prices, particularly of raw materials.

Great Britain 100 years ago was a creditor nation and still is. She has likewise been a most important manufacturing nation and her policy therefore has been to make money dearer and world prices low. The obligations of debtor nations were payable in gold. It was therefore to the interest of Great Britain to make gold dearer, as her imports were largely in commodities, principally raw materials. Thus Great Britain became the greatest commercial nation in the world. But the time came when the gold standard failed; when prices fell to so low a level that financial disaster menaced her; and so, for the first time, an eminent British commission has insisted that the world cannot escape disaster unless there shall be an increase in prices throughout the world. The fall in prices and the low exchange of the oriental currencies have seriously injured Great Britain's foreign trade, particularly in the Orient. Her "sound money" policy failed, and China, forced by the gold-standard policy, has engaged i nmanufacturing activities and has developed industries until Great Britain's trade, particularly her textile trade, in the Orient is seriously jeopardized.

Great Britain's course in India cannot be defended. She forced her financial policies upon the 400,000,000 people of that country. She demonetized silver and rarified gold, though in so doing the world depression resulted.

Mr. President, the League of Nations, by one of its committees known as the "gold committee", recently made an exhaustive study of the causes of the world-wide depression, and submitted a report to the effect that it was largely due to monetary disturbances and dislocations; and that it was imperative that the level of world prices should be raised if prosperity was to be enjoyed. The inference was very clear from the report that the only way to obtain an increase in commodity prices was by the enlargement of the circulating medium throughout the world.

There are increasing evidences that the orthodox believers in the efficacy of the gold standard are departing from their faith. Even Mr. Keynes, who for years was a devout believer in the gold standard, has, if I understand his position, materially modified his views. Recently he stated:

Gold as the sole standard of the purchasing power is almost a parvenu—

By which he means that perhaps for thousands of years the two metals—gold and silver—have been basic money. He further adds—

That of late years an attempt has been made to have gold envelop itself in a garment of respectability as densely respectable as was ever made even in the realm of sex or religion.

He then adds:

Whether this garment of respectability was put on as a necessary armor to win a hard-won fight against bimetallism and is still worn as the gold advocates allege because gold is the sole prophylactic against the plague of fiat moneys, or whether it is a Fraudian cloak we may not be curious to inquire.

And Mr. Keynes further adds that—except through very brief periods during the world's history gold has been too scarce to serve the needs of the world's principal medium of currency.

Mr. Ernest Seyd, a distinguished English bimetallist, in his book, states that—

It is a great mistake to suppose that the adoption of the gold valuation by other states besides England will be beneficial. It will only lead to the destruction of the monetary equilibrium heretofore existing and cause a fall in the value of silver, from which England's trade and the Indian silver valuation will suffer more than all other interests, grievous as the general decline of prosperity all over the world will be. The strong doctrinarianism existing in England as regards the gold valuation is so blind that, when the time of depression sets in, there will be this special feature; the economical authorities of the country will refuse to listen to the cause herein foreshadowed. Every possible attempt will be made to prove that the decline of commerce is due to all sorts of causes and inconceivable matters. The workman and his strikes will be the first convenient target; then speculation and overtrading will have their turn.

Senator John Sherman was perhaps as much responsible for the demonetization of silver in the United States as any other person; but he, for many years, if I read history aright, was a believer in bimetallism. On the 11th of April 1876 he said:

The enormous effect of this law—that is, the demonetizing of silver—in Germany, and as a consequence the partial demonetization of silver coin, I suppose, is felt by every man, woman, and child who buys or sells anything. I suppose there is no act of parliament that has had so wide-reaching effect as this act of the German Parliament. * * * The amount of coin in the world is estimated by Mr. Seyd and other technical writers at $3,200,000,000 of silver and $3,500,000,000 of gold. A struggle for the possession of the gold at once arose between all the great nations because everybody could see that if the $3,200,000,000 of silver was demonetized and $3,500,000,000 of gold coin made the sole standard it would enormously add to the value of gold; and the Bank of France, the Bank of England, and the Imperial Bank of Germany at once commenced grasping for gold in whatever form. Therefore, what we have observed recently is not so much a fall of silver as it is a rise of gold—the inevitable effect of the demonetization of silver.

It is evident that Senator Sherman recognized the quantitative theory of money, and that by the demonetization of silver, prices of commodities measured by gold did decline and that gold, measured by human toil and commodities, did materially increase in value. I quote again from Senator Sherman, who stated in a speech delivered on the 30th of August 1893:

If we adopt the single standard of gold, without aid from silver, we will greatly increase the burden of national and individual debts, disturb the relation between capital and labor, cripple the industries of the country, still further reduce the value of silver—of which we have now in our Treasury and among our people over $503,000,000, and of which we are the chief producer—and invite a struggle with the great commercial nations for the possession of the gold of the world.

His prediction has been verified. Following the demonetization of silver, the struggle for gold began, and it is manifest that that struggle led to falling prices, industrial and economic disturbances, and world-wide depression.

The British Royal Commission, appointed to inquire into the cause of the depression of trade reported:

1. That the depression dated from the year 1873, or thereabouts;
2. That it extended to every branch of industry, including manufacturing, mining, and agriculture, and that it was not confined to England, but had been experienced, to a greater or less degree, in all the industrial countries of the world;
3. That it appeared to be closely connected with the serious fall in general prices which, even then, was most observable, though it has since been more strongly marked, resulting in diminution—in some cases even the total loss—of profits and consequent irregularities of employment for the wage earners;
4. That the duration of the depression has been unusual and abnormal;
5. That no adequate cause for this state of things was observable unless it could be found in some general dislocation of values, caused by currency changes, and which would be capable of affecting an area equal to that which the depression of trade covers.

And the Commission then added—

Neither metal exists in sufficient quantities to serve as a sole standard without causing such a change in the level of prices as to amount to a commercial and financial revolution.

That prices fell following the demonetization of silver is conceded by substantially all economists. In an article in the London Economist published in 1888, the statement was made that there would be a general decline in prices of 33 percent; and Sir Robert Giffin in 1886 estimated the fall in the price of articles exported from Great Britain at 50 percent and that on imports at 33 percent.

Senators are familiar with Dr. Soetbeer, an eminent authority upon monetary questions. In his work, published as I recall, in 1888, he stated that comparing the average prices of 1886 with those of the period of 1871–75, taking 100 commodities as examples, the fall in agricultural prices had been 31 percent, animal products 23 percent, mines and metals 40 percent, textile materials 24 percent, and miscellaneous 32 percent.

I cannot refrain from placing in the RECORD a statement from the historian Hume:

We find that in every kingdom in which money commences to flow in greater abundance than formerly everything takes a new face. Labor and industry take on new life. The manufacturer becomes more diligent and skillful. Even the farmer follows his plow with greater alacrity and attention. A nation whose money decreases is at times weaker and more miserable than another nation which possesses no more money but is on the increasing hand. Falling prices and misery and destruction are inseparable companions. The disasters of the past ages were caused by decreasing money and falling prices. With the increase of money, labor and industry gather new life.

Professor Jevons, referring to the gold discoveries of California and Australia, said that—

Prices turned upward in a sudden and decided manner and that this change was simultaneous with the discovery of the new gold fields. If the philosophy of observation and common sense may be applied to statistical matters we can draw but one conclusion, that prices have risen in consequence of the gold discoveries. The gold discoveries had the double effect of arresting the fall of prices and then raising them. The total effect is not merely the rise that has occurred but that rise plus the fall that would have occurred.

Senator Sherman in 1869 said:

The contraction of the currency is a far more distressing operation than Senators suppose. To every person except the capitalists out of debt or the salaried officer or annuitant it is a period of loss, danger, lassitude of trade, fall of wages, suppression of enterprise, bankruptcy, and disaster. It means the ruin of all dealers whose debts are twice their business capital, though one-third less than their actual property. It means the fall of agricultural production without any great reduction of taxes. What prudent man would dare build a house, railroad, or a factory or a barn with this certain fact before him?

Mr. Balfour upon another occasion stated that—

The general consensus of scientific opinion has for many years thrown with an overwhelming balance of opinion into the scale of the double standard, and I say that on that question there is practically now a consensus of economic and scientific opinion which has devoted itself to the elucidation of this purpose, and any man who in the face of that opinion now quotes any of the old tags about demand and supply making it impossible to fix a ratio between the two metals or such doctrines as that the interference of the state fixing prices must necessarily fail—any man who now relies upon doctrine of that kind to show that the double standard is an impossible thing does nothing more than to write himself down as a man ignorant of latest development of scientific political economy.

Mr. President, even the most orthodox gold monometallist confesses that the normal increase in population and the normal expansion of business require the accretion to the gold stocks of the world of at least 3 percent per annum.

That means that if the world rests upon the gold standard Mother Earth must add to the monetary gold stocks of the world 3 percent annually or prices will fall, industrial and economic disturbances will result, which will culminate in universal depression.

Eminent geologists and students of the money question declare that the gold yield of the world will soon show material reductions.

Mr. Francis W. Hirst, who was for years the editor of the London Economist, in his book entitled "Money", published last year, states that—

> The universal gold standard is in danger by the probability of a rapid decline before very long in the production of the Rand.

He further states that—

> The exhaustion of the South African mines has long been predicted and experts have even assigned dates at which the decline of the output would commence.

Mining experts familiar with the South African gold mines predict that they will practically be exhausted by 1947. In view of the almost certain reduction of the production of gold many students of the money question are insisting that silver constitutes a part of the metallic monetary stocks of the world.

Mr. Hirst, to whom I have just referred, in the book mentioned, states that—

> There is no reason why silver should not be brought into play to assist gold, and enlarge the metallic basis of the world's currencies. On the assumption generally accepted that an international currency of notes convertible into gold or into gold and silver should be the aim of currency reformers, and on the further assumption which is also generally accepted that gold prices ought to be raised gradually to something like their 1925 level, I regard silver as the best instrument by which these objectives can be achieved in conjunction with the measures for the redistribution of gold and a more economic use of it by some of the central banks.

He suggests that various named countries "should part with a small percentage of their gold and substitute silver as a part of their reserves", and he estimates that if the plan which he suggests were carried out, in all probability the purchasing power of gold in commodities would decline, and the gold price of silver would have risen considerably more "seeing that silver would have been in a measure remonetized by this new demand."

He states that—

> As a result of this plan the price of silver would be doubled or trebled and that a rise in the value of silver would greatly assist export trade with the Far East and it would also help to restore the prosperity of silver-producing mines in all parts of the world.

Mr. Srinivas Van Wagel, in his recent work, entitled "World Economic Depression", states that—

> In the relentless efforts of some nations to hold others in economic bondage and others, composing the majority, to shake off the shackles, gold is being used as the weapon of the creditors.

He further states that—

> Gold is being used to shackle the world, economically and politically, and that the value of silver must be increased. Gold must be strengthened by the addition of silver.
> If silver is used for currency reserves and relieves gold of a part of its burden, prices will rise, and there will be increased prosperity. The other alternative is a collapse of prices, curtailment of commerce, and possibly reversion to barter.

These statements were prophecies, because since they were made there have been a collapse in prices and a curtailment of commerce, and, in many parts of the world, reversion to barter.

The author further states—

> Why should it not conduce to stability and better organization of internal credit if gold is implemented with silver for reserves against circulation? There is no other metal, in addition to gold, of which sufficient is produced and which has the qualities needed for banking purposes, than silver. Even now silver is predominantly the circulating money in almost every country, even though the silver coins in circulation have a greatly reduced silver content. New reserves in silver can be had by withdrawing the silver coins in circulation in almost every country. * * * This wealth of silver can be utilized for purposes of world rehabilitation. The production of silver is approximately 250,000,000 ounces a year. Part of it at least can be utilized as effective money metal. Thus, silver, together with gold, with even a reduced output in forthcoming years, might form an efficient reserve for circulation and a sound basis for credit.

He further adds:

> It was a criminal waste to dump silver in the east after it was depreciated in value, because it was divested of the function it should have been performing. Now there is an opportunity for the redemption of the gold standard with the aid of silver and if silver is used for currency reserve, and relieves gold of part of its burden, prices will rise and there will be increased prosperity.

The views of Mr. Hirst, Mr. Van Wagel, and many others to whom I could refer, give support to the principle underlying the measure under consideration. This measure recognizes the inadequacy of gold to meet the monetary demands of the world; it recognizes that silver for thousands of years constituted a part of the basic monetary money of the world, and that the addition of silver to the metallic monetary stocks will relieve the tension or strain upon gold, strengthen the monetary base upon which currencies and credits rest, increase the volume of money in the world and thus increase the world's commodity price level.

A measure providing for an increase in the use of silver for monetary purposes is not an experiment; it is not even heterodox; it is a sound, rational plan calculated to improve economic conditions in the world. If by some sudden miracle the gold stocks of the world were increased 50 or 100 percent, there would be an instantaneous rise in the prices of commodities; the wages of labor would be increased; factories and plants now idle would be put into commission, and millions of unemployed would find profitable employment.

It is conceded by historians and writers upon monetary questions, that the silver mines of the New World, following the discovery of America, rejuvenated Europe, gave vigor to the people, so that the feudal system was demolished and a genuine intellectual and material renaissance came to all countries of Europe.

The bill before us contemplates the use of silver for monetary purposes—it places silver side by side with gold, and is a forerunner of the day not far distant when the mints of all countries will be opened to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at a ratio agreed upon and accepted throughout the world.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the general problem confronting the world is the revival of commerce not only in this country but from one country to another. So far as the United States is concerned we have a paradox. There has been mentioned here the starvation in the midst of plenty. Our system of production has produced on the farm and in industry far beyond the dreams of the wildest imagination.

The basis of commerce is the exchange of goods. While we produce in overabundance in industrial sections of the country, and while we have produced in overabundance in agricultural sections of the country, piling up surpluses of the products of industry and piling up surpluses of the products of agriculture, the strange situation is that the people in the industrial centers cannot get the products of the farm and the population in agricultural centers cannot obtain the shoes, clothes, and other products of the industrial centers. These goods cannot be exchanged one for the other.

That condition has existed since our credit system exploded in 1929. Since that time there has been no medium of exchange to further the business of exchange and to make exchange of goods possible. That medium of exchange used to be furnished by the banks of the country, but the banks of the country have not been able to furnish that medium of exchange since 1929.

It has been said that the banks do not function and cannot function, in furnishing the medium of exchange for the exchange of goods, because of the lack of confidence. The basis of the credit system and the basis of the banking system of the United States is credit. Credit is based upon confidence. There is plenty of confidence in the credit system when credit can be liquidated. There is plenty of confidence in the credit system when debts can be paid. When there is a possibility for the borrower to return his loan, when there is a possibility for the lender to collect the money he lends, money is borrowed and lent.

But when we have an economic situation where the borrower does not know whether or not he can pay his loan and the lender does not know whether he can collect, we have no confidence, and so our credit system does not function; and because it does not function we have no medium of exchange in the sense that our usual medium of exchange has been furnished by bank credits.

It is said the banks are full of money. The banks are full of debts. The more deposits a bank has, the more its liabilities and the more it owes. Those debts have been the basis of the system of furnishing a medium of exchange in the amount of 97 percent of the country's medium of exchange.

The question is, How can we restore an exchange of commodities from industrial centers to agriculture and from agricultural centers to industry, so that those on the farms may obtain the industrial products produced by labor and industrial workers may obtain the agricultural products produced by the farmer?

The deadlock in our credit system and banking system still exists as it started in 1929. It cannot function because of the overwhelming amount of debts, public and private, municipal and corporate, in the country, with its fixed charges sucking the life of industry and of agriculture like a leech, making it impossible for our commerce to function.

It is said by very many economic writers that the trouble lies with the unjust distribution of gold. Let us look into that matter with the people who want to return to the gold standard and who say we can redistribute the gold. Gold, like any other commodity, obeys certain laws. Gold has been distributed here and in France because circumstances over which we have had no control brought the gold here. Our trade balance is in our favor, payable in gold, and so gold came over here. Investments abroad, the charges of which were paid in gold, came here, so gold came here in settlement of foreign accounts. Gold went to France because of reparation payments and because of trade balances. How shall gold be distributed if not in payment of international obligations, in payment of trade balances, in payment of services due to citizens of foreign countries?

It is said that we ought to loan gold. We did that under the Dawes plan and under the Young plan, shipping gold abroad and loaning gold not only to foreign countries but to foreign corporations. Instead of relieving us of the pressure of gold, it increased the difficulty. All over the world, debts were created in gold far out of proportion to the production of gold. We had established a medium of exchange, a medium for the payment of debts, that could not be produced in sufficient quantity to pay the debts.

Three years ago, in talking to an English banker, I called to his attention the overwhelming amount of debts hanging over the world payable in gold, and that could not be paid in gold, and suggested that the nations of the world should furnish a medium of exchange that would make it possible to exchange goods from one part of the world to another; a medium of exchange which people could get as a basis of trade and as a medium for the exchange of goods. I suggested the remonetization of silver. All that he said, after discussion, was, "I think this is merely a fetish to get rid of debts." I said, "It may be a fetish, but it will make it possible to pay debts; and is not that a good way to get rid of debts?"

For what my opinion is worth, it seems to me that unless we furnish a medium of exchange so that goods can be exchanged we cannot revive commerce. The upward trend of prices for which we hoped must in the last analysis be based upon demand for goods. If we can exchange goods, there will be greater demand for goods in the amount in which goods can be exchanged. If I have something to sell that you want and you have something to sell that I want, we exchange, and if we live close, as neighbors, we can barter; but in a country of 120,000,000 people, with the vast area that we have here and in the world, we cannot confine ourselves to a system of barter. We must have a medium of exchange.

Much as I should like to see it, I should like to see any method pursued and any policy inaugurated which would make it possible to exchange goods from one part of this country to the other, from one part of the world to the other.

It is said that in order to bring about recovery all that it is necessary to do is artificially to raise prices, and that when prices are artificially raised people will buy. People will buy to the limit of their desires first, and those desires are unlimited. They will buy goods to the extent that they have something with which to buy. They have nothing with which to buy but the commodities they produce or the wages they earn. If we restore a medium of exchange so that they can sell their goods, it will make possible increased demand and higher prices and the purchasing power of the great mass of the people will be restored.

Without casting any reflection on the good motives of anyone, let me point out now where I think we have failed to restore purchasing power to the great mass of the people.

Under the N.R.A. we abolished the antitrust laws. When the N.R.A. bill came back from conference I voted to send it back in order to reinstate the Borah amendment to prohibit fixing prices and gouging the public through fixing prices through monopolistic practices. I am not familiar with all the codes; but take, for instance, the steel code, which revived the old, vicious practice of the Pittsburgh-plus system, under which the United States Steel Corporation discriminated against various communities of this land and fixed prices under the aegis of monopolistic practices. Under the old Pittsburgh-plus system, which was abolished after an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission, the steel mill at Duluth would sell steel in Chicago for $13 a ton less than it would sell it for in Duluth. Under the revised code, revised on the 31st day of May, Duluth was made a base-price point; but even under the revised code the Duluth mill will be compelled to sell steel in Chicago for $9.60 a ton less than in Duluth. The prices of amounts of less than half a ton have been raised in some instances as high as 800 percent, and the consumers of steel products will pay those prices.

Here is an industry fixing prices in some instances 800 percent higher than they were under the old system of fixing prices, and gouging the public in higher prices before the public has had its purchasing power increased.

Take the paper industry. I am mentioning these things because they enter into the national scheme, the economic policy that we are pursuing, and I feel that it would be treason not to speak of these things, that the Senate may be informed regarding them. I cannot believe that the President of the United States will tolerate these practices if they are properly called to his attention.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do.

Mr. HATFIELD. Price fixing took place with all the large industries throughout the country, did it not? It took place as to the price of steel, the price of coal, the price of all of them, as a result of the suspension of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I must say I am not familiar with all the codes. I am talking about the codes with which I am familiar.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the Senator that that is the case.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Now, take the paper industry. The Joint Committee on Printing advertised for sealed bids for a little less than a million dollars' worth of paper. The bids were opened. There were 47 bidders. The bids were found to be about 90 percent identical. The prices were from 10 to 40 percent higher than they were in 1929 and averaged something like 100 percent higher than they were a year ago.

When the bids were opened the bidders were asked how it happened that 90 percent of the bids were identical. They said they were identical because of the method of fixing prices under the code, the open method of advertising bids 5 days before the bids were opened. They said they had not gotten together to agree on prices or to raise prices; but, as a result of that method of arriving at prices, 90 percent of the bids were identical, and, as I said, the prices were from 10 to 40 percent higher than they were in 1929. When they were asked why prices were so much higher than in 1929, they said it was due to the high cost of labor.

So I went to the code authority for the paper industry and asked to have prepared for me the wage scales in the paper industry for the year 1929 and the wage scales under the code. I wanted those wage scales to show what the average man received at the end of the month in 1929 in that industry and what he received under the code at the end of the month in this year in that industry.

We found that the hourly wage was practically the same. But in 1929 the average man in the northern zone received $125 a month, and under the code he received $65. When that was called to the attention of the deputy administrator and he was asked to explain it, he said it was because of the fact that now, under the code, we are operating about 50 percent of capacity, and in 1929 we were operating 75 percent of capacity, that when the industry, under the code, increases production, increases its capacity, these differences will be made up.

Let us see how far they can be made up. Working 75 percent of capacity in 1929 the average man received $125. Working 50 percent of capacity under the code the average man in the northern zone receives $65 a month. Under the code, if the industry increases its production to 100 percent of capacity, working 40 hours a week, 160 hours a month, the most the average worker can receive in the northern zone will be 160 times 57 cents, which is the hourly wage, or about $90 a month, provided the industry can increase its production to 100 percent of its capacity. So, under this arrangement, the average worker in the northern zone will receive only $90 a month working 100 percent capacity, as compared with $125 a month working 75 percent of capacity in 1929.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. In other words, the worker has had his hours reduced in number, his work opportunities per week reduced, and down with them went the price he was paid for his work?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will cover that. Calling that to the attention of the deputy administrator, he said, "Well, we put more people to work." How have we put more people to work? Let us assume that the Senator from West Virginia has a job and that I have not a job. We cut down his income and his hours in order to give me a job. He divides his income with me. That makes him support me. It makes the poor support the poor, while the industry has an increased price of from 10 to 40 percent over the price of 1929.

Mr. HATFIELD. Even more.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In some instances greater even than in 1926, the year of the highest price for paper.

These policies, which undoubtedly have been inaugurated in good faith, are not producing the purchasing power or redistributing the wealth or the income of the Nation, restoring purchasing power to the great mass of the people, as we were told the N.R.A. would do.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that in Huntington, W.Va., a shoe industry located in my home town, working something like 1,000 people, has reduced the hours of work, the workdays of the people per week have been reduced, and the commodity the plant was manufacturing has increased in price 100 percent. Yet the price the workers were paid for their labor was reduced because of the work opportunities being reduced per hour and per day and per week.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It seems to me that industry in this regard is as stupid as it was before the crash of 1929. No one can deny that the crash came largely because industry and finance took so much of the national income that they destroyed the purchasing power of the great mass of the people. They evidently have not learned anything in the last 4 years. They seem to expect to collect out of the people what they lost in the last 4 years, and they seem to expect to collect it this year. In my opinion, they are just as foolish as would a farmer be who had a herd of cows which had not had anything to eat or drink for a week, and instead of giving them something to eat and drink, the first thing the farmer does is to start to milk them. It is impossible to get milk out of a cow unless she is first given something to eat or drink. We cannot get money out of the great masses of the people unless we put something into their purses, either in the form of wages or in the form of prices for the commodities they have to sell and which they produce. Industry, in my opinion, is very stupid not to do that, because the more they pass to the people in the form of income the more they can collect. They take it all back, anyway, just as the farmer collects in milk whatever he feeds to his cow.

I have pointed these things out, not in the way of destructive criticism, but for the purpose of calling attention to certain tendencies which ought to be corrected, and which I hope can be corrected. I hope that those who have the ear of the President will call them to his attention in order that they may be corrected.

Let us take, for instance, the agricultural program, undoubtedly inaugurated in good faith. From the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry we learn that the farmers' income last year was about $6,000,000,000, and, under benefit payments, something over a billion dollars more is to be paid to the farmers of the United States. I believe that will amount to between seven and and eight billion dollars. Let us say it is $8,000,000,000. The farmers will still be short $5,000,000 of what they had in 1926, and yet their charges in interest and taxes are higher than they were in 1926. The fixed charges on debts incurred under a high-price level, when the farmers had an income of $13,000,000,000 a year, cannot be paid on the basis of an annual income of seven or eight billion dollars.

Agricultural prices have advanced, it is true, but, under the price-raising program of the N.R.A., the farmer will pay more, in my opinion, for what he buys, if he has anything at all with which to buy, than he will get in increased prices for farm products, outside of benefit payments. If that is true, the American farmer, so far as his debts and his fixed charges are concerned, will be as hard up or worse at the end of this year than he was last year.

Mr. President, this is not offered as a matter of criticism; it is offered as a matter of calling attention to facts which we must face.

So far as the pending bill is concerned, I am not enough of an expert to explain the probable effect of it. It will increase the reserves for our currency by 25 percent, by resulting in the purchase and addition to the base of the currency 25 percent in silver, and to that extent will increase the reserve for our currency. I believe we have a billion and a half in excess of the necessary reserve now. That, so far as the economic life of the Nation is concerned, and so far as the exchange of goods is concerned, does not do us any good, because it can be used only on the basis of credit, and the credit system is not functioning. If we add 25 percent in addition to the reserves, what the effect will be, when we already have more reserves than we need, I do not know.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is touching precisely the subject which disturbs me in this argument. Under the Federal Reserve Act, we could tremendously expand the currency, if we wanted to, with the reserves we have.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am sure we want to, but we cannot do it.

Mr. FESS. We can expand to the extent of two and a half times. What disturbs me is, suppose that all that is claimed for the pending bill shall take place; how are we going to get the money into circulation?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator says we can expand the currency now. I should like to have the Senator say how we are to do it. We want to do it; we have been trying to do it for 4 years, and have failed to do it.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is confusing currency with circulation. I am not talking about circulation; I am talking about currency. Instead of having $3,000,000,000 of Federal Reserve currency we could reach over $8,000,000,000 with what we have now as a gold basis. But how would we get it into circulation if we should increase it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. One way by which it could be put into circulation would be through the payment of Government salaries and Government contracts with it; I mean under the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. FESS. It could be done now. We would simply be substituting actual cash for checks.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Would the Senator think that all business should be done in actual cash, and that we should avoid all credit?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am trying to find a way to get a medium of exchange, which we do not now have.

Mr. FESS. I am not complaining at what the Senator is saying. He just made a suggestion, I thought, as to what was confusing to him, and I wanted to say that that is the thing that is confusing to me; that is, if we issue any amount of money, how can we pump it into circulation unless there is a business demand for it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There could only be a business demand when there was a medium of exchange for the exchange of goods, which I claim is the foundation of commerce.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is correct if we say we are going to eliminate the credit system, and, instead of doing business on credit, through checks, do not allow any business to be done except by the passing of actual currency. Then, of course, we would have to have an enormous amount of currency.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator. We have tried to make the credit system and the banking system function for 4 years by pumping Government credit into the banks and into industry. The Government credit is the only credit which seems to function. We have been told that pumping Government credit into business and into industry would prime the pump and start the credit system going. I do not know how many Senators were raised on farms, where water has to be drawn out of a pump, and I do not know how many of them have primed a pump, but I should like to ask if any Senator has ever tried to prime a pump that was cracked?

Mr. FESS. A pump which is cracked cannot be primed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. No; one cannot prime a pump which is cracked. And our credit system cracked in 1929, and we have been pouring credit into it ever since, but we have failed to prime the pump. We must find some other way to obtain a medium of exchange. If debts could be reduced by one-half we would revive our credit system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator expired several minutes ago.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his request?

Mr. PITTMAN. I withhold my request.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, it will be remembered that on December 21, 1933, the President issued a proclamation relating to the coinage of silver, the purpose of which was to carry out an agreement entered into at the World Economic and Monetary Conference in the city of London on July 20, 1933, in which a delegation representative of the American Government participated. The leader of the delegation, so far as monetary agreements were concerned, was the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. He was the author of the monetary resolutions adopted at the London Conference.

At that conference the Senator from Nevada accomplished something in behalf of silver which had never been done before in all history. He persuaded the representatives of 66 governments that silver should be used as money instead of being treated as a mere commodity.

To go back into history for a few moments, it will be remembered that at the close of the Napoleonic Wars the ratio of the coinage of silver to gold in Great Britain was 15½ to 1, and in France 15 to 1. Under those circumstances it was profitable to ship silver to France and gold to England. That slight, and perhaps chance, difference in the ratio between the two countries was what placed England originally on the gold standard, and the English became accustomed to having gold and only gold as the basis for their currency. The English definitely adopted the gold standard about 1816, and being a great commercial nation, with wide-spread business interests throughout the world, the gold standard became to the British mind the only standard of measurement so far as money was concerned.

The rest of the world remained on a bimetallic basis, until the Franco-Prussian War, when there was levied by Bismarck upon France a fine equivalent to a billion dollars in gold in American money. The Germans, after acquiring that vast sum of gold, determined that it was to Germany's advantage to go upon the gold standard. The German Government proceeded to do so and to sell its surplus silver.

Dumping the German silver upon the world market had a repercussion upon the Latin Monetary Union, which was established by Napoleon III. That union consisted of France, Switzerland, Belgium, Italy, and Spain, which had a common unit of value in gold and silver. The members of the Latin Monetary Union found that with the excess silver dumped upon the market by Germany they could not maintain a bimetallic system and went upon the gold standard.

The next effect was in our own country, where Congress, in 1873, abandoned bimetallism and established the single gold standard.

In all these instances governments, in order to accomplish something to their own immediate advantage, took action detrimental to the use of silver as money.

With the principal commercial nations of the world adopting the gold standard, the monetary demand for silver was greatly lessened. The average market value of silver from the time of its demonetization in 1873 up until the World War was about 60 or 65 cents an ounce.

The World War created a demand for silver, particularly on the part of Great Britain, in order to purchase supplies in far eastern countries. At one time during the war silver went above the 16-to-1 parity of $1.29 an ounce, until it paid to melt silver coin, because the bullion value of silver was greater than its coinage value. That fact was used by the British Parliament in 1920 as an excuse for debasing all of its silver coinage. The British Government called in all the shillings, the sixpence, and half crowns that were then coined at 975/1,000ths fine, melted them up, and reissued its entire coinage half silver and half alloy. That Government took out of its coinage over 101,000,000 ounces of silver, and made, of course, a substantial profit in doing so.

Other European nations thought that if the British could thus make a profit, they might as well follow the example thus set. Belgium entirely abandoned the use of silver coin. Debasement was also practiced by France, Germany, and other European countries.

Taking silver out of the coinage and dumping it upon the market, one nation at a time doing so to make a profit, had the effect of driving down the price of silver to a point lower than was ever recorded in all history.

It was not a natural price; it was an artificial market price produced by abandoning the use of silver as money. Governments and governments alone ruined the price of silver. That movement, known as "the flight from silver", continued until the London monetary conference. Then and there the senior Senator from Nevada for the first time persuaded the representatives of 66 nations in attendance that it was to the interest of the countries they represented and to the interest of the whole world, that there be no further discrimination against the monetary use of silver. A solemn compact was entered into which in substance provided that all such governments would no longer melt up or debase their silver coins, that no legislation should be enacted that would depreciate the value of silver; that upon the contrary they would, as soon as they conveniently could, resume the use of silver for minor coins, instead of using fractional paper currency, as is now customary in many instances.

For the first time, I say, in modern history, or in all history, representatives of all the principal nations of the world came together and realized that they should act in concert with respect to the coinage of silver. The senior Senator from Nevada is more responsible than any other one man in the world for bringing about that agreement. His sound and persuasive arguments brought about that result.

In addition to that, there was made a further agreement that the great silver-producing countries of the world, the United States, Canada, Australia, Mexico, and Peru, should provide for the purchase of new silver produced from their mines and using the same in their coinage. The great silver-holding countries of the world, China, India, and Spain, also agreed that they would limit future sales from their surpluses and would no longer dump silver upon the world market.

The United States was a party to that agreement, and to carry out our share of it, the President of the United States issued a proclamation last December, the concrete effect of which was that our Government would pay 64½ cents an ounce for all newly mined silver produced in the United States.

When the senior Senator from Nevada returned from London he was kind enough to explain to me in some detail just what had occurred. We decided that the best way to carry the monetary agreement into effect was for the President to issue a proclamation. In order to be helpful to the President, we drafted a form of proclamation which we suggested that he use. I am frank to say that the proclamation as finally issued quite closely conformed to the suggestions we made, except that we recommended that all American-produced silver be purchased at the rate of $1 per ounce.

The senior Senator from Nevada at that time asked me to prepare a statement justifying the issuance of such a Presidential proclamation. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have printed at this point as a part of my remarks a copy of the letter addressed to Mr. McIntyre, the secretary to the President, and the memorandum which I submitted under date of September 29, 1933, justifying the issuance of such a proclamation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and memorandum are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., September 29, 1933.

MARVIN H. MCINTYRE,
Secretary to the President.

MY DEAR MR. MCINTYRE: Referring to our talk before you left Washington, I am enclosing the draft of a proclamation relating to the coinage of American-produced silver and some reasons why it should be issued by the President.

Some days ago Senator PITTMAN was kind enough to fully explain his proposal to me, and I suggested that the best way to be of service to the President would be to prepare the text of a proclamation for his consideration. Key asked me to draft such a proclamation, and what I have done he has taken pains to revise.

The present market price of silver is about 40 cents an ounce in United States currency. With the dollar worth only about 66 cents in gold, the value of an ounce of silver measured in gold is only about 27 cents, a price so low as to be ruinous to business conducted on a silver basis and, consequently, paralyzing to our trade with all silver-using countries.

The immediate objective should be to reestablish a world price for silver of about 60 or 65 cents an ounce. Save for two interruptions, due to the war in 1917 to 1920 and the depression in 1929 to 1933, world commerce has been accustomed to that price for over a generation. With governmental discriminations against silver removed by the London agreement, the natural law of supply and demand may be trusted to find a proper price for that metal after 1937.

I am in complete accord with Senator PITTMAN in the belief that this purpose can be accomplished by the President through such a proclamation. We hope that this result of our labors will be helpful to him.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senate.

COMMENT AND JUSTIFICATION

The effect of this Executive proclamation will be to—

1. (a) Carry out the American part of international monetary agreements in which representatives of the United States have joined, and thereby encourage all other nations signatory to the agreements to do their part.

(b) Increase the price of silver throughout the world with a consequent improvement in world trade with the countries where silver is used as money.

Within the United States the following results may be expected:

1. An increase in the money in circulation, strictly limited by the amount of silver produced, which can do no harm and will be particularly helpful in all metal-mining regions.

(a) The average annual American production of silver from 1922 to 1931, inclusive, was 58,000,000 ounces. In 1932 the production was only 24,000,000 ounces. While it is very doubtful if that much could be acquired, if 200,000,000 ounces were purchased during the 4 years, the total number of silver dollars coined at 0.7734 fine ounces to a dollar would be 258,597,000.

(b) In 1900, when the United States adopted the gold standard, the total monetary stock of gold was $1,034,384,000, or $13.56 per capita. The monetary stock of silver was $648,995,000, or $8.51 per capita. Our metal money then consisted of 62 percent gold and 38 percent silver.

On February 28, 1933, the American monetary stock of gold was $4,399,540,000, or $35.09 per capita. The monetary stock of silver was $846,775,000, but the increase in population has reduced the per capita of silver to $6.78. We now have about 86 percent gold and 14 percent silver.

(c) Adding $250,000,000 to the monetary stock of silver would raise the per capita of silver to about $8.75, or approximately what it was in 1900. It would also require more than an additional billion and a half of silver dollars to restore the proportion of silver money to gold money that existed when the gold standard was adopted.

2. Added value to lead, zinc, copper, and other ores which have a silver content and thereby make more profitable the production of the limited quantities of such ores as are fixed by the N.R.A. codes under which they are mined.

(a) The origin of silver produced in the United States from 1928 to 1931, inclusive, is as follows:

	Percent
From lead-zinc ores	55.25
From copper ores	24.76
From gold-silver ores	17.14
From purely silver ores	2.85

3. Compliance with the pledge made in the Democratic national platform of 1932 for the rehabilitation of silver by an international monetary agreement.

THE PROPER PRICE TO BE PAID FOR NEWLY MINED OR "VIRGIN" SILVER

The effect of charging 23 percent of the weight of silver tendered at the United States mints as payment for the cost of minting and seniorage is to fix the purchase price of a fine ounce of American-produced silver at $0.9956, which is, for practical purposes, a dollar. The mint price of silver produced in the United States to be purchased with silver dollars in accordance with the President's proclamation should be close to $1 per ounce, because:

1. The average world price of an ounce of silver for the years of 1921 to 1929, inclusive, was $0.6263. During those years gold was worth $20.63 an ounce. Gold has now advanced to $31 per ounce in United States currency, an increase of over 50 percent. To do no more than rehabilitate silver to its predepression value as compared to gold requires a like 50-percent increase for 62.63-cent silver, or a price of $0.9394. This is so near $1 that, with the probability of some further advance in the price of gold, establishing approximately $1 an ounce as the purchase price of American silver is reasonable.

2. The Pittman Act of April 23, 1918, is a precedent for paying $1 per fine ounce for silver. While the United States mints from May 1920 to June 1923 were paying $1 an ounce under that act for silver produced in the United States, the average world price of silver, for that same period was 69.13 cents. Assuming that the same causes produce the same effect, in order to have a world or gold price of about 60 to 65 cents an ounce, our Government should again pay $1 an ounce in American money for silver, the product of mines situated in the United States.

THIS PROCLAMATION WILL NOT CONFLICT WITH A FUTURE PROCLAMATION REDUCING THE GOLD CONTENT OF THE DOLLAR

Fixing the purchase price of American-produced silver at $1 per fine ounce in United States currency will in no way interfere with any future proclamation, which events may require the President to issue, reducing the gold content of the dollar. This is demonstrated by the following mathematical propositions:

The mint price of gold was $20.67 an ounce, and a gold dollar contained 23.22 grains of gold. The dollar has now declined about one-third and the price of gold has advanced about one-half.

1. If the price of gold should advance 100 percent to $41.34 an ounce and the dollar is stabilized at that point, only 11.61 grains of gold would be required for a dollar, or one-half as much. If the silver dollar remains at its present weight of 371.25 grains of fine silver, the coinage ratio of silver to gold would be 32 to 1. This would fix the price of silver, as measured by 23.22 grains of gold, at one-half of $1.2929, or $0.6465, an ounce.

2. If the price of gold should advance 75 percent to $36.17 an ounce when the dollar is stabilized, 13.27 grains of gold would be required, or 57 percent as much, and the ratio of the new gold dollar to the present silver dollar would be 28 to 1. It would not then be profitable to melt standard silver dollars unless the market price of silver was above $0.7370 an ounce.

3. If the price of gold is increased 66⅔ percent to $34.46 an ounce and the dollar is then stabilized, 13.93 grains of gold will be required, or 60 percent as much, and the gold-silver coinage ratio would be 26.65 to 1. The melting-point price of silver would then be $0.7757 an ounce.

4. Stabilization of the dollar at the present price of gold—$31, an increase of 50 percent—would result in a dollar containing 15.48 grains of gold, or two-thirds as much as before. The coinage ratio of silver to gold would be 24 to 1, and the melting-point price of silver $0.8620 an ounce.

The President is not authorized to cut the gold content of the dollar more than 50 percent and it does not at present appear likely that he will be compelled to go that far. He can now provide that $1 an ounce in silver dollars will be paid for silver mined in the United States with no risk of embarrassment when the time comes to finally determine the weight of gold in the dollar and definitely fix a ratio based upon the number of grains of gold in the gold dollar and the number of grains of silver in the silver dollar. That can be done without any change in the weight and fineness of the present silver coins.

CARL HAYDEN.

WASHINGTON, D.C., September 29, 1933.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the 15-minute limitation begins now, does it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. It begins in 2 minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the Democratic Members have exhausted their time.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. Why would it not be well to suggest the absence of a quorum and then recognize the Senator from Ohio, who will have 15 minutes on the pending measure and an amendment? If it is agreeable to the Senator from Nevada I will now suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall be glad if the Senator will do so.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], occasioned by illness, and the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and my colleague the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], detained on official business. I also announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] is absent, occasioned by the necessity of attending the funeral of his late colleague, Mr. COFFIN, of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not want to allow some of the statements made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to pass without comment. I take it from what he had to say that the maldistribution of wealth is one of the diseases that ought to be cured, and this proposed legislation will be, at least in part, a remedy. He stated that 4 percent of the people own 80 percent of the wealth. I am afraid that that statement is true; but I do not know how we are going in any way to counteract what has actually taken place unless we undertake to control all the laws of production, distribution, and consumption. It is a matter that is written not in any monetary system but it is written in the differentiation of ability among men and women. If we are going to find fault with what God has done in making people not all alike but, on the contrary, making them so unlike, then we are confronted by a greater problem than I had ever thought the Congress would attempt to solve.

Take any typical town, I do not care what town it may be, and look at its population. Here is one man who is a thinker, who possesses courage and resourcefulness. He organizes a business; employs people at the ruling wages and salaries. Oftentimes such a man fails, and sometimes he succeeds, and when he does succeed he becomes a leader in business, a great employer of labor, a wide distributor of the fruits and comforts of life. There is the most radical difference between his stage in life measured by what he has accomplished in accumulating this world's goods and all the other people of that town.

Is the monetary system properly a subject of criticism on that basis? Why is it that we have a Henry Ford, with his accumulations, and employing 50,000 people at good salaries and fairly good wages? Are we going to find fault with the ability of brain to organize a business, multiply the comforts of life, and distribute them as never before among the people of the country simply because one man has accumulated greatly and the people who are around him have not accumulated in the same degree?

Why is there a Chrysler? Why is there a Wilbur Wright? Why is there any inventor? Edison in one short life had to his credit patents from which accumulations were derived amounting to over $16,000,000,000. Of course, he did not own that much, but he took out the patents and benefited the world through the application of the discoveries he made. It was his brain that made it possible. Are we going to condemn a system because it enables one man, through his inventive genius or his discoveries, to accumulate wealth and another man, through his ability and capacity, to organize a business, and then, by taking perhaps a very small percentage of the individual profit on an article, to accumulate enormous wealth? How are we going to counteract such conditions? They are not due to the monetary system. No monetary system could have prevented what I have described, if it should have been prevented; and when it is said there is a very pronounced maldistribution of wealth, of course there is, and there always will be.

My friend from Idaho calls attention to our loss of trade in the Orient. How much trade has China? She has less than 2 percent of the world's trade. Suppose we had all the trade of China, what would that mean in the great sum total? It is looking at a gnat and making of it an enormous insect. The truth about the matter was stated by me on a previous occasion, not on sentimental grounds or on any dogmatic principle, but I stated it at considerable expense of time and energy and pointed out the actual figures of the trade of China and India with ourselves.

I showed that the trade had fallen off not because of the monetary system, for, as China claims, the monetary system is to her advantage. That point was argued here without the Senator from Idaho evidently noticing it, for he stated that the Orient was taking our trade, and assumed that it was because of our monetary system, and at the same time complained that silver had been denied to those countries and therefore we were at a disadvantage. I pointed out here that as silver was being imported the export trade of China was increasing, and instead of the lowering of the price of silver being a detriment it was an advantage to China. Those are the facts; they are not propaganda; they are not the expression of anyone in Europe of the type of mind of Mr. Keynes and others who have been propagandizing along this line for years.

Mr. President, it is these facts that are disturbing to me. I am somewhat surprised that the Senator was carried off, as I thought he was not in 1896, with the Coin Harvey philosophy and the General Coxey ideas in Ohio. I say I am surprised at it. I want to state again it is not the amount of money, but it is the working of that money that must be the determinant. It makes no difference how much money there is. We could now under the law, without changing a word of it, without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t" create $8,000,000,000 of new money. But suppose we did it; how would we put it into circulation? How would it work? How could it be employed until there was a demand in business for it?

My friend from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has suggested that the way to do it would be to deny the use of credit and have the Government, instead of issuing a certificate of wealth, issue the actual wealth and pay not in checks but in gold or silver. If we should undertake to do that, there would not be money enough in the world to transact the business of this country alone. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said, we have not gold enough to transact the business of the country. If that is true, then we have not silver enough. It would be fallacious, in the light of that fact, to say we should use both gold and silver.

Putting the two metals in circulation, we could not any more keep them together than we could keep a hen and a duck together by law. With the two metals circulating, the cheaper would drive out the dearer, and we would be on the basis of the cheaper money. If there is not gold enough, there is not silver enough, and we cannot use both of them unless all the nations of the world shall agree upon a ratio.

If we need more money and, therefore, must use silver to add to the gold, then our concern ought to have other countries enter into an agreement to put into circulation both gold and silver and not to discriminate in their purchases between the two, but always to take either one so they would be interchangeable. In that case we could keep the metals in circulation and increase the amount.

My time has expired, and my closing statement is that, while it is unfortunate that the gold has gotten into the hands of a few governments like the United States, Great Britain, and France, when there ought to be a better distribution of gold, the methods which are proposed by this kind of legislation will defeat better distribution instead of furnishing a remedy. The remedy will indeed be worse than the disease.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I note the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma. He desires to be present before the vote is taken. I, therefore, suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Hayden	Patterson
Ashurst	Costigan	Hebert	Pittman

Mr. LEWIS. May I be permitted to reannounce the absence of certain Senators and the occasions for such absence as announced on previous roll calls?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I propound a parliamentary inquiry. Under the present unanimous-consent agreement is it the understanding that I may have 15 minutes on the amendment pending and likewise thereafter 15 minutes upon the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is advised that that has been the construction placed upon the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Oklahoma again state his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I inquired whether or not under the unanimous-consent agreement I would be permitted to have 15 minutes upon the pending amendment and thereafter 15 minutes upon the bill if I choose to occupy as much as 30 minutes time in toto.

Mr. McNARY. That was not the intention in proposing the unanimous-consent agreement. It was my intention to limit debate to 15 minutes on both the bill and the amendments. That is the language of the unanimous-consent agreement, if the Chair will read it in the CONRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupant of the chair is not advised of the exact terms of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the occupant of the chair if he is aware of the controversy which ensued Saturday afternoon just before we recessed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupant of the chair is entirely ignorant of that controversy.

Mr. McNARY. The proposal first made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] I thought incomplete, and I stated one in my own language which was adopted. Surely the language of the agreement carries out my intention which was to limit debate to 15 minutes on the bill and the amendments. If the Chair has a different interpretation of the agreement I shall abide by his decision.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, my understanding of the unanimous-consent agreement was that we should have 15 minutes on each pending amendment or on amendments which should be offered from the floor and 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. McNARY. That is not my understanding of the agreement at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, in proposing the agreement I desired in the first place to limit debate to one speech by each Senator and not exceeding 15 minutes on both the bill and any pending amendment. However, the language in which I expressed it is open to the construction that 30 minutes is allowed to each Senator—that is, 15 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on an amendment, or a motion that is pending or proposed.

I will state that as far as my understanding of the agreement is concerned, each Senator is at liberty to have 30 minutes on the bill and the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent agreement has been brought to the attention of the Chair, and it is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair that under it 15 minutes is allowed on the bill and the amendment, not 15 minutes on the bill or the amendment. That seems to be entirely clear from reading the unanimous-consent agreement as reported in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me say that that is not the understanding I had, and not the understanding that the proposer of the unanimous-consent agreement had; but I am willing to abide by the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, if the Chair's construction will discommode anyone, I am willing to say that each Senator may have 15 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on any amendment, making 30 minutes in whole.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course a Senator could speak only once on the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; and I would rather have the agreement extended than strictly construed if the Chair's construction will disappoint any Senator who desires to speak longer than 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a proposal for modification of the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. McNARY. I propose it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks that the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made be modified so that no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill, nor more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment thereto.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to say that before I consented to the agreement I conferred with the leader, and I think—without binding myself or my colleague—I conferred with my colleague. My understanding of the agreement was that Senators should have 15 minutes on each amendment now pending or that might be offered and 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think that is the correct interpretation of the agreement, and that the construction which has been placed on agreements of this character is that a Senator may speak on the bill 15 minutes and then may speak on the amendment 15 minutes; but, of course, he cannot speak on the bill more than once.

Mr. McNARY. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair heard no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He may speak again on another amendment 15 minutes.

I do not think there need be any difficulty about it. We have made that application of agreements in language almost identical with this for a long time. Technically, of course, it is not correct. Technically, a Senator should speak upon the question that is pending, which would be the amendment before the Senate at the particular time he speaks; but by the construction I have stated we have permitted a Senator to consume his time on the bill whenever he was ready to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair heard no objection to the request for modification of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. McNARY. In order to relieve the RECORD or the Chair from any doubt as to the proper construction, I propose that the agreement be modified, if necessary, so that each Senator may speak once for 15 minutes on the bill and once for 15 minutes on any amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the modification proposed by the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the pending amendment, offered by myself, proposes to strike out section 2 of the pending bill and insert a new section in lieu thereof.

I ask to have the clerk read section 2 of the bill as it is pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one-fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I now ask that the clerk be permitted to read the amendment to section 2 in the nature of a substitute offered by myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out lines 5 to 9, inclusive, on page 1, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary metallic reserves of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one-fourth of such reserves by value in silver.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I find myself supporting this measure, not because it proposes to remonetize silver, but in spite of the fact that it does not remonetize silver.

If silver is now remonetized, this bill continues the policy of remonetization. If silver is not now remonetized, this bill does not change one iota the status of silver.

All this bill does is to authorize the Department of the Treasury to go into the markets and buy some more silver as a commodity and add such commodity to our present stock of silver.

Mr. President, this bill does not go as far as I think the bill should go. If it is the desire of Congress to pass a bill providing only for buying more silver, of course, I have no objection. I favor that; but that does not in any sense satisfy me.

Silver was demonetized in 1873. We initiated a policy of buying silver in 1878. That act did not remonetize silver. Because it did not remonetize silver, in 1890 the Congress passed what is known as the "Sherman Silver Purchase Act." Those two bills were mandatory. The Bland-Allison Act provided that a certain amount of silver should be purchased each month. The act did not do the job. The Sherman Silver Purchase Act provided that four and a half million ounces of silver should be purchased each month. That act did not do the job. If those two bills were bills remonetizing silver, which I contend they were not—and they went much further than this bill—then how can this bill, which provides for no purchase per month, be a bill proposing to remonetize silver?

If it be the policy of the Congress simply to go out in the world market and buy some more silver as a commodity and put it in a storehouse at some place, somewhere, sometime, and that is the judgment of the Congress and the Government, of course I have no objection; but that does not go as far as I had hoped this silver bill would go. I thought we were proposing to remonetize silver, and make silver again standard, primary, and basic money of this Nation.

Today silver is token money, no more important in our financial system than the nickels we have in our pockets, no more important than the pennies we have in our pockets, and no more important than the paper money we have in our pockets. Silver is not primary, basic, or standard money.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. While that is true, yet is it not also true that the bill will create some demand for silver, and to that extent help to stimulate the price?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Exactly so. We provided for the purchase of a lot of cotton. That helped the price of cotton.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not quite fair, though, to say that the bill will have no more effect on silver than if it were pewter or tin or nickel. It will help to the extent of creating some demand.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If we should go into the open market and agree to buy a certain number of tons of copper to be coined into pennies, that would help the basic or commodity price of copper. If we should go into the open market to buy nickel, an alloy, that would help the price of nickel. If we proposed to use pewter as money, and should go into the open market to buy pewter, that would help the price of pewter, provided we should buy some pewter; and to the extent that we may buy silver the price of silver will, I hope, be benefited. Yet under the Bland-Allison Act and under the Sherman Act, and even under the Pittman Act, when we had to buy silver mandatorily, the price of silver was not materially increased.

I propose so to amend section 2 that the silver which we acquire and place in our storehouses shall be standard, basic, and primary money.

How can we add fiat to our reserves and make that fiat worth anything? That is what this bill proposes to add, if we may understand the statements made by its proponents. We are to add 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver to our stock of money. Unless the price of silver increases, the 2,000,000,000 ounces, from the standpoint of intrinsic value, will be worth less than $1,000,000,000, yet those 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver will go into our stock of money on a fictitious value of $1.29 per ounce, or at a total of intrinsic and fiat value of $2,500,000,000—one billion real and $1,500,000,000 of fiat. Who ever heard of fiat being made the basis of reserves, a basis for the issuance of money?

Mr. President, if the present section no. 2 shall be stricken and the substitute section shall be adopted, we will place silver in our reserves on the basis of value, not fiat. We will buy silver at whatever price silver can be had, and add that silver to our reserves at what it cost; so the silver will enter the reserves on an intrinsic value alone, and not upon a fiat value of $1.29 per ounce.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to call attention to an editorial appearing in today's Washington Post. This editorial is under the title "Chinese Silver."

In the editorial I find a quotation from one who is purported to be a famous economist by the name of Sir Arthur Salter. In the latter part of the editorial Sir Arthur Salter is presumed to be quoted, and I will read the quotation:

> There can be no doubt that during this period the net result of the steady depreciation of silver was (in spite of the arguments of the silver group to the contrary) of great advantage to China.

This refers to the falling price of silver in China over past years. There was a time, in 1920, when silver was worth $1.38 or $1.39 an ounce. From that time to this silver has fallen in price, in value, in China, and Sir Arthur Salter says "that that falling price of silver in China was of great advantage to China." Again the editorial says:

> At present the rise in the value of Chinese silver dollars in terms of the depreciated currencies of other nations has been accompanied by a decline in Chinese domestic prices and increasing trade dislocation. Since the fall of the dollar has aggravated these difficulties, the Chinese cannot be expected to hail enthusiastically our plans for "helping" them by raising the price of silver and thereby causing further appreciation of their currency.

Mr. President, is the American Congress legislating in behalf of the people of China, or are we attempting to legislate in behalf of the people of the United States? This editorial states that if this bill shall be enacted, and shall have the effect of raising the world value of silver, that will hurt China. The inference is that, to the extent that it hurts China, it will help the people of the United States.

On yesterday a great paper published in New York City, the New York Times, carried a two-column news story on the financial page, referred to earlier today by the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I wish to read some extracts from this news story. I ask that, after I shall have read the extracts, the entire story may be published at the end of my remarks as exhibit A.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The news story has the following headline:

> FAR EAST A RIVAL IN WORLD INDUSTRY—STUDENTS OF FOREIGN TRADE NOTE INROADS ON MARKETS OF WESTERN NATIONS—TARIFFS CALLED "FUTILE"—RISE IN SILVER PRICE WOULD REVIVE EXPORTS TO ORIENT, IT IS CONTENDED

Now, I read the first paragraph:

> For the first time in history the western world is keenly feeling the industrial competition from the Far East. This competition, according to those who have made a close study of the situation, reflects lower production costs in the Far East due to a lower wage scale, comparable mechanization which has been imported from the occidental nations, and the low price for silver and the Japanese yen, which, because of the proximity of Japan to China and other silver countries, is closely wedded to silver.

I wish to read a significant statement further on in the article. This statement shows, if it be true, that large American manufacturers are closing their establishments in the United States and transporting the machinery to China. One big concern, unnamed in the news story, is reputed to have closed American factories and transported the machinery to China, throwing out of employment 10,000 American laboring men, and, instead, setting up the machinery in China, employing Chinese laborers, to make cheap goods, not only to bring them back to the United States to come into competition with American-made goods, but, in addition, to send those cheaply made goods to the other nations of the world, where they will come in competition with American-made goods. I read from the news story as follows:

> It is difficult to determine to what extent American capital is playing in the industrial development of these Chinese ports. However, it is known that one large international concern, owned partly by American capital, recently dismantled four of its factories here, employing approximately 10,000 workers, and transferred its operations to Shanghai. When an official was criticized for the move because of its effect on the unemployment situation here, he replied that his responsibility was first to the shareholders of the corporation.

Mr. President, is the American Congress responsible to Americans who have factories in China, or is the American Congress responsible to the citizens of the United States at home? This news story states that Americans have transferred capital to China, set up that capital in the form of machinery, and employed the cheap labor of China in manufacturing goods in China, to come into competition with goods manufactured in the United States.

I call attention again to some figures to reinforce the arguments I have been trying to make on this floor in past years. I have tried to make the argument that if we should increase the circulation in the United States, we would thereby make money more plentiful, and that if we could make money more plentiful, we would make money cheaper, and that if we made money cheaper, we would make prices rise. Let me at this point call attention to the things which have happened over the past years.

In 1896 there was a great campaign in this country over the silver question. The Democratic Party, the party to which I owed allegiance at that time and the party to which I still owe allegiance, was the sponsor of the silver movement. At that time the United States had only $600,000,000 of gold within her borders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will take my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In 1896 we had only $600,000,000 of gold. In the next 4 years that gold had increased to the sum of $1,034,000,000. In 4 years' time the gold in circulation increased $434,000,000.

Likewise the circulation in 1896 was only $1,530,000,000. By 1901 it had increased to $2,100,000,000. So in 4 years' time not only had the gold increased but likewise the amount of money in circulation—gold, silver, and paper—had increased $575,000,000.

More money came into circulation, money became more plentiful, money became cheaper, prices increased, and when 1900 arrived the great W. J. Bryan, who had argued for higher prices, saw prices higher, and prices had risen to such an extent that he could not go before the people again and make a campaign upon the money question. The increase of gold throughout the world and the increase of gold coming to the United States and the increase in circulation had caused a rise in prices to such an extent that in 4 years' time the silver question was deadened, or silenced, at least, for the time being.

In 1914 times were bad again, and what did the Democratic Party do to help out the people of the United States? In 1914 we had only $1,891,000,000 in gold in this country. In 1919, still under Democratic administration, the gold had increased to $3,113,000,000, or an increase of $1,220,000,000. With the expansion of the money in circulation prices increased accordingly.

How about the circulation in the same years? In 1914 we had in circulation only $3,359,000,000. From 1914 to 1919, or in 5 years' time, the circulation had increased to $5,863,000,000, an increase in the circulation of $2,504,000,000.

I submit those figures as an unanswerable argument that, to the extent to which we make money more plentiful, to that extent, comparatively, at least, we raise commodity prices, and that apparently is the thing we are all trying to do at the present time.

Mr. President, a few days ago I made the statement that the banks at this time were not lending money, and at that time I did not criticize and at the present time I do not criticize them for not making loans; but they are not making loans, and I gave the reasons why loans are not now being made.

The banks are collecting money today, and to the extent that they can collect money they buy Government bonds. So that the banks, having the money and no place to lend it, are doing what with it? They buy Government bonds, and the banks have so purchased Government bonds in the past 2 or 3 years that now the banks are using their resources through the purchase of Government bonds.

Mr. President, what is to happen if the circulation of money shall not be increased, if gold shall not increase, if we do not make silver basic money, what is to happen? The banks are not creating any deposit money; they cannot under present conditions. When the banks buy up all the bonds their surplus money will permit of, then where is the Government to find a market for its bonds that it must hereafter issue?

I hope that within a very short time it will not be necessary to sell any more bonds; but we are selling bonds now, and we will sell them next year, we may sell them the year after that, and it may be that we will have to sell bonds for years to come, because our income may not be sufficient to balance the Budget; and if the income does not balance the Budget, we will have to borrow in order to pay the bills incurred under our program of spending.

I ask the question again, What will happen when the banks have no more money with which to buy bonds? The people cannot buy bonds. When that time comes, this is what I think will happen:

Most bankers are wise; they understand the situation. They will know the influence and the trend of government. These wise bankers will see that if they are to realize on their bonds, and not hold them, perhaps, for a loss, they must commence selling the bonds. Then the wise bankers will quietly enter the bond market and begin to reduce the number of bonds in their portfolios, and when the few wise bankers begin to sell the bonds, the only market will be other banks, and these other bankers will soon join in the bond-selling movement. Then what will we have? We will have a bond crash, exactly as we had a stock crash in 1929. That is what I am trying to avoid.

Mr. President, I have made this statement on the floor of the Senate many times, and I am glad today to be able to read one or two paragraphs from a well-known journalist and writer, Mr. Mark Sullivan. Mr. Sullivan had one of his syndicated articles in the public press of yesterday, and I read one or two paragraphs from it, as follows:

> One thing is sure: Business recovery, and pretty prompt business recovery, is indispensable to the country. For the same reasons it should be indispensable to the administration. We can put it this way, in a chain of "becauses":
> The country (and the administration) must have business recovery because we must have profits; we must have profits because we must have the taxes which come in great part from profits; we must have taxes because we must stop borrowing, and must pay the interest on what we have already borrowed.
> The same thing can be put the other way round and in briefer form: If we do not have great business recovery, then the administration must go on borrowing. And if the administration goes on borrowing it will come presently to the point where it cannot borrow any more. And when it cannot borrow any more it must do what Germany did, take to the printing press and inflate. In other words, we must have business recovery, and have it in large proportions and early—else we shall have inflation.

Mr. Sullivan comes to the same conclusion at which I have arrived in my reasoning upon this question.

Mr. President, before I conclude I ask permission to insert in the RECORD that portion of my remarks which I am unable to read because of time after I shall have used my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent to make exhibit B the minority report submitted to the House of Representatives on H.R. 14756, by Representative WILLIAM L. FIESINGER, of Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In his very able address the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio, Senator FESS, gave voice to the proposition that in order to restore confidence to business, business should know on what basis they make contracts and what value they will receive when the contracts mature. I would like to express my approval of that statement as a sound monetary policy and to point out that that desired accomplishment is the aim and object of an amendment which I have offered to this bill.

I freely admit that this bill will fail in its object as long as silver is used as token money. I have already given fully my reasons for this, and I will not repeat them now. Silver as token money is merely a commodity in the Treasury, an asset as would be the ownership of cotton or wheat. If the Senate accepts the amendment that I have offered to this bill, we would give to silver legal tender qualities just as we have given gold legal tender qualities for the very purpose of breaking the corner on gold, relieving the excess demand for gold, restoring to gold normal demand in proportion to its supply for the purposes of world money. And I am sure the Senator from Ohio will admit, since he expresses his belief in the operation of natural law and in the law of supply and demand, which he says is just as operative as the law of gravity, that when we restore the supply, demand ratio of monetary gold to its normal level, we will reach the result he would advocate because business will then know on what basis their contracts are made, and they will know what value they will receive when such contracts fall due.

If we can arrive at the normal purchasing power of gold and maintain it, we will have accomplished that great objective which the people of this country have a right to expect of their legislators, if such a thing is possible to accomplish.

I would next like to address myself to the question of what is the relation between the price of silver and the price of commodities. And by this expression, "price of commodities", I am referring to the wholesale commodity price level, which is the best gage we can get for determining what is the buying power or exchange value of gold.

I again refer to the amendment I have advocated to this bill and I am free to admit that there is no relation between silver and the exchange value of gold if silver is used merely as token money. That is the reason why I have objected to the provisions of this bill which make silver token money.

The point I urge upon the Senate for its consideration is that silver must be given the same legal-tender privileges and the same monetary use as gold is given. Silver must be made legal tender for its value in the markets of the world, for its world-accepted value, as I have already argued before this Senate. But when you do this for silver, who can deny that gold then has a monetary use a truly competitive position with silver.

Again, we get back to the fundamental law of supply and demand. It is only necessary to understand what was done by the Food Administration during the war to understand this application of the law of supply and demand. During the war the price of wheat became excessive and it became a burden. The Food Administration provided that corn bread should be used for human food throughout the country on certain days of the week. Did this increase the quantity of wheat? No; but it lowered the price of wheat, because it made a competitive commodity out of other grains and forced them to be used in competition with wheat in bread.

The world is suffering from a corner on gold. We all admit this corner must be broken. If we will give to silver legal-tender qualities, we will break the corner on gold by bringing a competitive commodity into the supply-and-demand ration just as we did with corn during the World War.

Let us say that there is no relation between the price of silver and the purchasing power of gold so long as silver is not given monetary uses in world trade; but we are forced to admit that there is a relation between the exchange value of gold and the price of commodities. Values have in the past been expressed in gold. When we return to normalcy they will again be expressed in gold. It must be admitted that there is a relation, therefore, between the purchasing power of gold and how much of a given commodity gold will purchase.

We can admit that there is no direct relation between silver and world prices, but there is an indirect relation.

This indirect relation was referred to by one of the world's greatest bankers, Mr. Montague Norman, governor of the Bank of England, in his testimony before the Hilton-Young Commission in London. He said there is an interaction between gold and silver prices, which is none the less serious because it is indirect and not very apparent on the surface.

It should be plain, therefore, to the Members of the Senate and to this Government that if the amendment I have proposed is carried into this bill that this relation can be used to restore the confidence that the distinguished Senator from Ohio has mentioned as necessary for business revival.

I also agree with what the distinguished Senator has said with reference to the trade with China. It is true that there is a balance of trade in favor of China. It is also true that this trade balance is expressed with silver. For the present I will leave out of consideration the invisible factor in the trade balance where Chinamen who live abroad remit back to China a part of their earnings.

I will concede for the sake of argument that if we enhance the value of silver we will not thereby secure from China any material part of her stocks of silver in exchange for our surpluses of production.

But, Mr. President, that is not the point. Will the Senator contend that if we double and treble and quadruple our trade with China we will not have the opportunity to dispose of a part of our surpluses of production? The trade balance may still be in favor of China, but if we will export 4 times as much or even 10 times as much to China, will not that furnish an outlet for part of our surpluses of production, and will it not furnish a food supply to the millions who are now starving in China?

Under the amendment I have proposed to this bill we would restore the silver of China to a recognized status in world trade which would furnish to China, as a nation, a stability of value and a wider usage to their silver holding, and it cannot be denied that this is the equivalent in world values of setting up in China additional capital for operation, and it cannot be denied that capital for operation means increased activity, increased business, and increased profits, which is the basis of buying power and the basis of trade and commerce.

Again, we get back to the amendment I have offered. To raise the values of silver will not affect, in my opinion, materially the trade with China, but to restore silver to a monetary status by giving it legal tender qualities and making it a part of the world's monetary basis is a very different thing. And if we do this under a law in the United States, which gives us a reasonable control over the amount of silver that we can employ, we will have a vastly different situation and a vastly different result.

As I have already explained to the Senate, we will thereby raise the value of silver, and by putting silver in competition with gold we will lower the value of gold as to its purchasing power in the markets of the world.

With reference to world trade, I wish to say that our trade with China is a very small part of our world commerce, and if we give silver the use as proposed in the amendment I have offered we will not only increase the capital and the basis for banks' reserves in China, but also in all of the other nations of the world and by exactly the same reason if we increase our trade with China, we will also increase our trade with other nations.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio has read at great length from statistical figures to show that the production of silver in the United States is very small in proportion to our other industries and that the production of silver in the world is of very little value. The very essence of our monetary problem is to find a metal that is so scarce as to be a precious metal and, therefore, a metal which can be placed in competition with gold. The fact that silver is produced in small quantities is the very fact upon which we base our reason for our use of silver as a money metal. In fact, the Senator, elsewhere in his speech has expressed the idea that gold is of more value than silver and is preferable as money because the smallest volume possesses the greatest value.

We are not concerned with the small production of silver, nor are we concerned with the fact that the main use of silver has been and necessarily must be as a money metal. We wish the principal demand for the metal we set up as our money to come from monetary uses, and this, of course, is exactly our situation with gold.

The trouble with gold is that we have made it a standard of measure on the basis that it has no great use except for monetary purposes. Then we have later given it a different status and a very great demand by creating monetary reserves made up of gold. This additional use of gold is what makes it now necessary to have some other commodity than gold which we can deliver under our contracts.

Under the amendment I have proposed, these contracts which represent our debts can still be discharged by the delivery of gold values. We make no change in the values represented in these contracts, but we remove the corner on gold. These values can be represented—these gold values, if you please, can be represented—by another commodity, silver, which thereby becomes truly a competitor for the commodity gold.

To sum up my reply to the very able speech of the Senator from Ohio, it seems to me, and, in my opinion, it is clear that all of the arguments which the Senator has so ably directed against the proposal for a use of silver in our monetary system are directed at the fallacies and errors in the bill now before the Senate, and, in my opinion, it is also clear that these errors can be remedied by avoiding the very mistakes which seem to me to be apparent in the proposals of the bill, and which can be corrected by the amendment I have submitted.

I therefore urge in conclusion that the Senate seriously consider this amendment and incorporate same into the bill. If we do this I believe we have followed the only way out of our difficulty which the Senator from Ohio, expressed when he asked the question what will we do for a monetary unit after we have hoarded the gold and hoarded the silver and placed it out of use in the world's monetary system, because the only other necessary course, it seems to me, would be that we would set up a monetary system where the price-level control is entirely in the hands of the managers of a new money unit, which would no doubt be controlled by the direction of foreign management. It is inconceivable to me that the Congress of the United States could place the power to fix price levels outside of this Congress, and it therefore seems to me to be a matter of primary importance for us to amend the bill as I have proposed.

FAR EAST A RIVAL IN WORLD INDUSTRY—STUDENTS OF FOREIGN TRADE NOTE INROADS ON MARKETS OF WESTERN NATIONS—TARIFFS CALLED FUTILE—RISE IN SILVER PRICE WOULD REVIVE EXPORTS TO ORIENT, IT IS CONTENDED

By J. H. Carmical

For the first time in history the western world is keenly feeling the industrial competition from the Far East. This competition, according to those who have made a close study of the situation, reflects lower production costs in the Far East due to a lower wage scale, comparable mechanization which has been imported from the occidental nations, and the low price for silver and the Japanese yen, which because of the proximity of Japan to China, and other silver countries, is closely wedded to silver.

In an effort to throttle this competition virtually all of the important industrial nations of Europe and the United States have raised their tariff barriers against goods produced in the Orient. Only recently England took steps in that direction which had been preceded by the United States and Germany. While the raising of tariff barriers has been reasonably effective in keeping Japanese and Chinese manufactured articles out of the countries which have taken this step, the result has been that these goods have found a market in other countries formerly supplied with these articles by the occidental nations.

Because of this condition the raising of tariff barriers does not solve the question. For instance, electric-light bulbs from Japan flooded this country last year at a price with which the largest electric-light bulb manufacturer in the world could not compete. The raising of the tariff on light bulbs kept them mostly out of this country, but their sale was then transferred to South America and other countries which the American manufacturer formerly supplied. As a result, the effect on the American manufacturer was little changed by the increased tariff, the result being that the domestic market was kept but the foreign market was lost.

BICYCLES ON ENGLISH MARKET

During recent months there has been a flood of Japanese bicycles on the English market at prices ranging from the equivalent of $3.50 to $4.50 for the de luxe models. England is a large manufacturer of bicycles for both domestic and export use. While England through a tariff could keep Japanese bicycles out of the country and her colonies, there is no way in which she could keep Japan from selling these bicycles to her customers in other countries except possibly through a reciprocal trade agreement.

Normally the activity of Japan in the foreign markets of the world would result in a favorable trade which would keep the yen at a level where export sales would be discouraged. However, in order to keep the yen at a level to hold the export markets, Japan has been a large buyer of raw materials in the world markets and also has been expending large sums of money in developing Manchukuo.

There is little doubt that a direct connection exists between silver prices and the price of cotton cloth because of the large amount of cotton goods sold in the Orient. Since their inception the cotton exchanges of Lancashire have posted the current prices of silver against the daily price of cotton. By experience those dealing in cotton and cotton fabrics know, a cotton authority recently said, that falling silver results in a decline in trade, more especially with the eastern markets, while rising silver leads invariably to relative improvement. On these points virtually every informed cotton man is definite in his convictions.

ENGLISH TEXTILE SITUATION

The predicament in which the English cotton-mill owners have been placed, due, most claim, largely to the fall of silver, is shown by the fact that these mills exported only 2,000,000,000 yards of cloth last year compared with 7,000,000,000 yards in 1913. During the same period their domestic-market sales dropped from 2,000,000,000 yards to 850,000,000 yards.

The reason for the drop of cotton-cloth exports by England, which also is now being felt by the United States mills, is due to the decreased purchasing power by the Orient because of the low price of silver. For instance, in China where a few years ago it required 1 ounce of silver to buy, say, 10 yards of cotton cloth, it now requires 2 ounces to buy approximately the same quantity of cloth. Also, the decline in the price of silver made possible the manufacture of cotton cloth in China on a profitable basis because of low wages, which are still being paid in silver at approximately the same rate as when silver commanded a much higher price in the world markets, and the nearness to markets in China and other parts of the Orient.

Because of this development there has been an influx of cotton manufacturing enterprises into the four treaty ports of China. Profits have been enormous, in 1932 ranging from a low of about 50 percent to about 75 percent, or sufficient to return the investment in less than 2 years. As a result, there is today the biggest real-estate boom in modern times in the four treaty ports of China, due almost entirely to the flood of foreign capital there to take advantage of the unusual conditions brought about by the low price of silver in terms of gold.

FACTORIES HERE TRANSFERRED

It is difficult to determine to what extent American capital is playing in the industrial development of these Chinese ports. However, it is known that one large international concern owned partly by American capital recently dismantled four of its factories here employing approximately 10,000 workers and transferred its operations to Shanghai. When an official was criticized for the move because of its effect on the unemployment situation here he replied that his responsibility was first to the shareholders of the corporation.

The foreign capital invested in these manufacturing enterprises in China opposes any move which would tend to increase the price of silver, because it would restrict Chinese exports and tend toward deflation there. However, so far as the natives are concerned, who have most of their savings in silver, the opinion is that they would be benefited and that higher silver prices would increase imports to China, while at the same time it would restrict exports of manufactured goods. So far as Chinese agricultural products are concerned, the consensus is that the volume would be little affected, although the price received in silver probably would be more.

ONE CAUSE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The decrease of manufactured exports from this country and England to the Orient during the last few years has been one of the causes of the large increase in unemployment in both these countries. If through an increase in the price of silver the trend toward manufacturing goods in the Orient could be checked, the feeling is that the unemployment situation both here and in Europe in time would be materially improved. Without something to stop the trend, the feeling in some quarters is that the United States and other industrial countries will become largely agricultural nations, while the Orient, with its millions of workers, will in time become the industrialized section of the world.

Silver is not only the common currency of China, but it has been so long the common currency of India that today most of the people of both countries, representing one-half the population of the world, are vitally affected by any depreciation in the price of silver. In the last few years, because of the drop in the price of silver, they have seen their savings drop more than one-half in value. The reduced purchasing power of the immense aggregate of small silver savings in these countries naturally is a vital matter in world trade.

Because of the lack of banking facilities, their lack of faith in paper currency and the high price of gold, the inhabitants of both these countries have put their meager savings in silver for more than a thousand years. In India alone there are about 700,000 villages and less than a thousand local banks, most of which are in the large cities. Virtually the same holds true in China. As a result, virtually all the savings of both these countries are in silver in one form or another.

EXHIBIT B

Mr. FIESINGER submits the following views:

When the Members of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-second Congress were elected, the United States was at the crossroads of its economic existence, suffering from the most blighting depression the country had ever experienced. The people in that election were motivated to find Representatives in Congress and a Congress which would find the cause and cure of the business paralysis that was fast engulfing the Nation and the world.

One of the most important matters for investigation and the most likely place to find the seat of the trouble was the money unit. Is it being manipulated? We all understand that if your yardstick is doubled, your value is halved, even though your property is of just the same productive power. Another important question relates to the adequacy of basic money. Does it expand and contract to the needs of increased or decreased demand? Our gold dollar is a unit of measure of value, but gold is also our monetary reserve. Does the demand for gold as a reserve fluctuate so much as to destroy the reliability of gold as our measuring rod of value? Does the demand for gold as a reserve upset its reliability as a measuring unit?

THE CAUSE OF THE DEPRESSION

The above matters come under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. After a careful investigation by this committee covering months of inquiry in consultation with witnesses from various parts of the world and with leading economists and financiers, this committee is forced to believe that it has arrived in its findings at the basic cause of this depression.

We quote the following from the report of this committee made to Congress on May 14, 1932, as definitely in point in announcing its findings as to the cause of this depression:

"The committee, through the weight of testimony, has learned that the major depressions have followed governmental action which directly resulted in the dislocation of money and through it, of commodity values, or, in other words, in the destruction of profits from productive industry. Profits reduced when the general commodity price level is suddenly lowered by whatever cause and completely wiped out when the price level goes below the cost of production. The position of the United States has shifted as a result of the World War from a debtor to a creditor nation. As a result of this, the profit from our productive industry has assumed greater importance, as it establishes through investment as well as consumption the basis of a market for our manufactured product. The maintenance of a condition of prosperity in the United States is, therefore, accentuated to the point that the restoration of productive industry to a profit-earning basis is of transcendental importance. To convey this idea in other words, we would say that the purchasing power of money must be brought back to normal, and, to do this, the causes of disequilibrium in money must be removed.

"Our investigation has revealed that certain European nations, in an effort to protect their manufacturing industries by affording a better cost basis through lower prices of raw materials and foodstuffs, suddenly and either inadvertently and unintentionally or quite deliberately depressed the world commodity price levels below the point that admits of any profit to the American producer. We find that this result has followed directly and definitely from certain governmental acts, the effects of which are clearly traceable, so that all the important facts are well sustained by the evidence we have gathered."

In other words, the cause of this depression is rooted in the legislative enactments of certain nations, and the direct effect of this foreign legislation on our business is to seriously control our profits, the value of our property, and the earnings of our people. Such a condition is incompatible with the vital interest of this Nation and must be controlled and corrected now that we understand the basic cause. The remedy becomes a comparatively simple matter and it consists of counterlegislation on our part to offset the results of foreign legislation and the effect thereof on our welfare and prosperity. In a word, we would place the United States in a position where it must defeat the point of attack. We must evolve a defensive or a protective remedy as against certain destructive acts of other governments.

DESTRUCTION OF VALUES

We find that the value of our farms, of our factories, of our homes, of our railroads, and even the value of the yield of our properties are shifted by the manipulations of foreign governments. And the evidence as to this is uncontradicted in our record. The values of property in most countries are measured in terms of their currencies. The value of property in the United States is measured by gold. If you manipulate the value of gold, you manipulate the value of everything that is measured by gold. Double the value of gold and you halve the value of every piece of property in the United States. In such a case the four hundred billions of property in the United States is reduced in market value to two hundred billions, but the two hundred and fifty billions of debts in the United States remain the same and our Nation as a nation is bankrupt. The findings of this committee is that the United States must defend its selected monetary unit which is the basis of its monetary and economic system. The United States must defend the market of gold and thus maintain it as a reliable and dependable measuring rod of value.

The United States must assume the control of the forces that have been used to manipulate the value of our yardstick of measure. We must control the manipulations of the buying power of gold as expressed in property. As a counter move to protect the manipulation of values of the property belonging to citizens of the United States this committee has reported out H.R. 14756, but many of this committee feel that this bill is a first step and will require amendment.

PRINCIPLES INVOLVED IN THE AMENDMENT

There are two principles on which this committee seems to be divided:

1. On the one hand, it is contended that the increased value of silver will solve the problem. Because the increase in value of silver will bring the desired price level of commodities.

2. The other principle and the one which is advocated by the amended bill is that silver is an indirect factor in the situation. Its effect is very important, but it is an indirect effect. The direct matter for our study and concern is the value of gold and how silver affects gold.

Many of the committee are in the position of opposing the committee bill. This procedure had to be adopted for the purpose of getting the matter before the House. The committee bill was reported out by a majority vote of the committee, but they did not thereby intend to be on record as recommending the bill. The amended bill reflects two principal points of objection to the first bill:

1. Merely increasing the price of silver is not adequate. If passed, it will require another law or amendment within 12 months. Silver value must not be merely increased or changed, it must be controlled or placed on a sound basis and protected from efforts to manipulate its value.

2. Our attention must be focused not on silver values, but on gold values. We should use silver to control the value of gold. It is a question of defending the gold market and not directly defending the silver market. Our values are all expressed in gold, not silver. Gold is the standard we must defend. Silver is the instrument of defense.

The principle advocated in this amended bill is, then, that we must put silver to a definite use as a part of our monetary reserves so as to preserve gold as a standard and protect it from those movements and shifting of values that destroy our business activities.

The principle put into action here is to break the corner on gold rather than a mere purchase act for silver. This gives the United States a positive plan. It puts the United States actually in control of the value of its property. We buy silver when we need to buy it and whenever it is sold to destroy our gold standard. Then after we have bought it we have a place to use it in our reserves. We do not buy it as the Farm Board bought wheat.

When there is a corner on gold we can put other values in our reserves to compete with gold. We thus preserve gold as a standard when we protect it from the threat of excess demand. We do not monetize silver, we only monetize our reserves. No monetary qualities are given to any silver except that which is placed in our reserves and the value of this is measured in terms of gold and so preserves our present gold standard as our single standard of measure.

But this use of silver is a definite use and it is a monetary use. It is a very different use from putting silver in the Treasury as a collateral convertible into money by its sale on the market as the Bank of India has lately done with such disastrous consequences.

RECAPITULATION

The amended bill provides an American plan for economic defense. What it accomplishes can be stated in very few words. "We preserve, by a definite plan, the honest dependable measuring qualities of gold as a standard unit of value."

We have adopted the gold dollar as a yardstick of value, we now must defend it from manipulation. Our committee has discovered that the value of gold is upset not so much by variations in the production or supply of gold. (The so-called "quantity" theory of money is not our point.) The defect of gold follows rather from variations in the demand for gold. We must not leave the demand element for gold to shift for itself or remain subject to the undisputed management of other nations.

The amended bill has as its object to correct the dislocation of our gold value unit and it does this not by a haphazard movement, but by controlled movement. Its object is to entirely free gold from the influence of the manipulations that have caused it to become a false standard, and after correcting the dislocation of gold values it proceeds to keep gold in normal position by defending it from manipulations.

The amended bill recognizes that silver had been used as a club to boost gold. Silver has been an instrument or means of unsettling gold and this is indirectly responsible for the present tragedy of "inflated gold", not directly responsible. It is contended by the proponents of this report that the direct connection between silver and commodities has not been indubitably established by the evidence. But the indirect bearing has been clearly established. The value of gold, which in our view, bears a direct relation to commodity price levels, is manipulated through the marketing of silver and indirectly reacting on gold by increasing the demand for gold. In other words, the amended bill uses silver as an agency to restore gold as a standard just as silver was used to destroy gold as a standard.

We exactly reverse the process that was actually used to bring about this depression. We reverse the process and keep the degree, to which we apply the process, under control. This bill puts the United States at last in control of the manipulations of the metal markets of gold and silver under a plan provided in this bill, which works to and maintains normal price levels. This bill counteracts manipulations whenever set in motion and it holds gold in terms of property or property values in terms of gold at the normal value of commodities as covering an averaging period of years.

This bill does not override natural law. It works in conformity to natural law. It does not legislate values; it legislates a new and definite siver use that becomes a demand factor and it leaves supply and demand free, under this use, to determine the price. This is in reality an American plan which puts the United States Government, for the first time in its history, in control of its economic welfare. The American Government under the amended bill takes a dominant position in the silver market. It does not merely accept silver as presented to it within the control and power of others.

No gold is required to be kept in reserve against the certificates herein provided for, as full value in silver is back of the certificates. Under the bill reported out by the committee, which in general principle follows the old Sherman law, a gold reserve is required as gold in the money of ultimate redemption back of these silver dollars. Also the provisions which call for rejecting certain lots of silver would defeat the very purpose of the plan, and under this bill silver in the vaults of the Treasury is not reserve but merely collateral.

Herewith is attached a copy of the amended bill.

WILLIAM L. FIESINGER,
Representing those of the committee favoring this report.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I desire to address myself for a few minutes to the pending amendment. I have spoken on the bill twice, and I think that is sufficient. I cannot refrain, however, from commenting on the article by Sir Arthur Salter. Sir Arthur Salter is a recognized economist of the same school as the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I mean by that that he sees nothing whatever in silver; but I should rather take his views as to conditions in China and opinions in China than those of the special writer of the Brookings Institution who was quoted so fully from by the Senator from Ohio.

I may say that that book came out quite a while ago, and even now is hardly read because it is so out of date. But Sir Arthur Salter states that the Chinese manufacturers do not look with favor or patience upon our efforts to raise the price of silver. He is entirely right in that statement, the reasons for which he gives. One reason is that it raises their costs of production and makes it more difficult for them to pay tariffs of foreign countries and then to compete in those foreign countries. Because of the tremendous difference in the value between their silver money and our silver money, though the two have about the same silver content, they can pay practically any tariff we have imposed and yet undersell us. It is such a simple transaction. We will assume that they can make 100 yards of cotton piece goods for a Chinese silver dollar. They come over here and sell it in this country for $2 American money; in other words, at 2 cents a yard. They could even pay a dollar tariff on it, have one American dollar left, go back to China, and buy three Chinese dollars, with which they could make 300 yards of piece goods to be exported and sold here. That is the way the transaction is handled. That is what is called "exchange."

What would happen when the price of silver were raised? If we raised the price of silver by a certain amount, they could go back and buy only two Chinese silver dollars. If we raised it to $1.29, they could go back to China and buy only one Chinese silver dollar. That is a simple illustration of what takes place everywhere. So, how anyone can conceive that the price of silver has nothing to do with the commercial transactions between the United States and China is beyond my comprehension, and certainly beyond the comprehension of Sir Arthur Salter. There can be no question about that. With the rise in silver, the very thing that makes it difficult for them to export in competition with our manufacturers makes it hard for them to buy here.

Of course, it hurts the Chinese manufacturers, but they have had a boom there for 3 or 4 years, while in our country we have had distress.

The very object of this bill, of course, is primarily to put back into our monetary system the amount of silver that we normally had there, and to restore its normal price. There is no question on earth that when this Government shall be directed and mandated to buy 1,300,000,000 ounces, such action must raise the price of silver, and in raising the price of silver in the readjustment of our currency it is going to tend to stop dumping from Japan and the Orient and every other country that pays its labor in silver. I do not want to go into that subject any further.

Now, as to this amendment. The original provision, section no. 2, was considered at five or six informal conferences of the so-called "silver group." It was considered in conference with the Treasury Department; it was considered in conference with the President of the United States; and it seemed to meet the approval of everyone there except the Senator from Oklahoma, who, I think, then maintained the same position he now maintains. The section provides:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one-fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver.

We have in the bill a definition of the word "stocks." Here is the definition of that word, if a definition be needed:

The term "stocks of gold" means the total amount of gold at the time owned by the United States, whether or not held as a reserve or as security for any outstanding currency of the United States.

That is as to gold.

The term "stocks of silver" means the total amount of silver at the time owned by the United States (whether or not held as security for outstanding currency of the United States) and of silver contained in coins of the United States at the time outstanding.

I contend that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is not sufficiently broad. See how it reads:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States the proportion of silver to gold—

The bill and the amendment are the same up to that point—in the monetary metallic reserves of the United States.

Are those reserves gold? Are they gold and silver? Do the reserves include dimes, halves, and quarters? Do the reserves include only the standard silver dollars held for the redemption of silver certificates? What advantage would be obtained by using the words "metallic reserves"? When silver stocks and gold stocks are metals, it is not necessary to say that gold is a metal or silver is a metal, but when we say as we do in the original provision that the stocks of gold and silver, which means all the gold and silver owned by the United States, whether in reserves or in circulation or in specie, shall be in the proportion of 75 to 25, we have a more definite expression than provided by the Senator from Oklahoma in his amendment.

I must admit that I fail utterly to see the distinction between the monetary effect of his amendment and that of the provisions of the bill as reported. I have heard it discussed, but I cannot see it; I just do not find it; I do not grasp it; I do not gather it; I do not understand it. I feel that it is not as definite a description of what we want as is contained in the bill, because we describe the words "stocks of silver" as being all the silver owned by the Government, whether in specie or in reserve, and we describe gold as all the gold owned by the Government, whether in reserve circulation or where not. Then, having described what we mean by stocks of gold and silver, we simply say that the proportion between the two shall be maintained at 75 percent for gold and 25 percent for silver. That is what we had in mind. I think that clearly the provision which was agreed to at the White House is sufficient.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there are just a few words which I feel impelled to say rather to the Senator from Oklahoma than to Members of the Senate, because I have such high regard for his interest in, his industry in behalf of, and his erudition on the silver question that I feel like making an explanation to him for voting against his amendment. I think the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has largely covered the objections which I have, but I trust the Senator from Oklahoma will bear with me very momentarily while I mention them.

I think, from one standpoint, that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma narrows the amount of silver which is to be purchased rather than enlarges it. It limits the proportion of silver to the "monetary metallic reserves", while the pending bill makes the proportion one-fourth of the "monetary stocks." "Monetary stocks" includes all the reserves and other things in addition. To illustrate, we have $2,000,000,000 of gold in this country set aside for a so-called "stabilization fund", which cannot be called a reserve. The result is when the proportion of silver is fixed according to the reserves, there is eliminated from the computation that $2,000,000,000 gold item, which will lessen the purchases of silver at least $500,000,000, which is considerably more than one-third of the purchases which will otherwise be made. So it seems to me the term "metallic reserves" is narrower than the term "monetary stocks."

However, the latter portion of the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is, on the other hand, broader than the provision of the bill as reported. It proposes that the computation shall be based upon value of silver and not upon monetary value. I wish that that portion of his amendment could be adopted, because that would fix the silver values in the proportion upon the cost basis, plus any change in the value, while the bill would base the proportion upon $1.29 an ounce.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that statement is quite accurate, for the reason that that does not take into account the fact that silver is bound to rise, and though, perhaps, we might get, while silver is cheaper, a little more of it into the Treasury of the United States, nevertheless, with the rise in silver approaching $1.29 quickly, we would get the value contemplated by this bill more readily under the provision as it comes from the committee.

Mr. ADAMS. My view, if I may say so to the Senator from Utah, is that as between the two amendments there will be no difference, if silver reaches $1.29 an ounce right away. The difference is in the time intervening. We are all hoping that the result will be a rise in price.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Can the Senator from Colorado give any assurance that silver will reach $1.29 right away? Is there anything in this bill that insures any time limit on the purchase of silver? Is there anything in this bill that says that the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase silver at any specific time?

Mr. ADAMS. I am very glad to give the Senator from Nevada my opinion, which is that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury may be relied upon to carry out the direction of this bill in the utmost good faith. The Senator from Nevada heard the President of the United States say in so many words he would carry it out enthusiastically. There is in the bill specific provision authorizing and directing the purchase of silver. While it does not say that it must be purchased so much this month and so much next month, I do believe that it is a mandatory provision, and the discretion is merely as to the time and the terms.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator unduly.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not mind being interrupted. I have merely a few comments to make, and they are fragmentary, anyway.

Mr. McCARRAN. Did the Senator in any conference—and I am asking this question directly—hear the Secretary of the Treasury say that he would carry out the policy of this bill?

Mr. ADAMS. I did.

Mr. McCARRAN. When and where? I was not present.

Mr. ADAMS. I heard him in the room of the Senator from Utah, the room of the Committee on the District of Columbia, say that he would carry it out enthusiastically, just as the President said he would do.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very sorry that I was not present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Nevada that the Secretary of the Treasury indicated at the various conferences held that he was in favor of a directory and mandatory provision in the bill. He said to me upon a number of occasions, and over the telephone 2 or 3 days ago, that he was enthusiastically and earnestly for carrying out the provisions of the bill because he was for it. I had known before the meetings were held in the room to which reference has been made that the Secretary of the Treasury was in favor of legislation of this character.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have a very profound respect for the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but I take it that those who are in favor of the remonetization of silver would rather have the word of the Secretary of the Treasury than the word of any Senator on this floor. The first bill that was brought in by the Secretary of the Treasury was denounced even by the learned Senator from Utah, and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] walked out of the conference.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I think it might be stated in fairness that the first draft of the bill which was presented to us merely provided that the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to purchase silver. Objection was made; then it was agreed that the word "direct" should be put in; and when it was put in it was perfectly well understood. I know the Senator from Idaho can speak for himself, but it is not my understanding that he walked out because of particular disapproval of what was going on in the committee. However, he is his own spokesman at all times.

As to this measure and the question of the Senator from Nevada, which embraced another feature, whether or not there was any assurance as to a rise in the price of silver, let me say that, of course, no one can assure any absolute rise; but I think it is reasonably certain that, if the United States Government shall purchase 1,300,000,000 ounces of silver, it is inevitable that there will be a rise in the price of silver, because it has been stated over and over again by those who are advocating silver measures that there is not that much commercial silver available for purchase.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Apropos to the last statement of the learned Senator from Colorado—and I want to make it clear to him that my heart and my soul are in this subject—it is only a question of so writing the legislation that it will accomplish the end desired by those who believe that silver can do something for the world, and not that the world can do something for silver; and therefore I am propounding the question to the learned Senator from Colorado. Reference has been made to the former silver-purchase acts. Does the learned Senator recall that after the Bland-Allison Act the price of silver dropped; that after the Sherman Act the price of silver dropped; and that after the Pittman Act the price of silver dropped?

Mr. ADAMS. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are these two differences: In the first place, the production of silver at that time was far greater in the world than it now is; and, in the next place, the purchases under the acts referred to were insignificant in amount.

We are proposing to purchase 1,300,000,000 ounces of silver, and we are proposing to do it promptly. We are proposing to continue the purchases until the monetary stock of silver shall equal one-fourth of our total reserve; until, otherwise, silver shall reach $1.29 an ounce. Such purchases in such magnitude have never been known in the history of the world.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. McCARRAN. If I annoy the Senator at all, I hope he will tell me, and I shall desist.

Mr. ADAMS. I am very glad to be interrupted, because the Senator and I are interested in the same subject and endeavoring to attain the same results.

Mr. McCARRAN. The trouble is, if I view the situation aright, that we are not bent on purchasing 1,300,000,000 ounces of silver, because if silver should go to $1.29 tomorrow all purchases of silver would cease.

Mr. ADAMS. When silver shall reach $1.29 an ounce the dreams of the Senator from Nevada and myself will have been realized.

Mr. McCARRAN. Provided silver shall go into circulation to relieve the conditions which prevail in the business world of the United States today.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator knows that the bill, while it is the greatest forward step in the silver movement since its demonetization, is not the ultimate aim of those of us who might be designated as the "silver group", but it will put us in a place where we may easily take the next step.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that one of the sections of the bill provides that for every ounce of silver purchased, no matter whether with gold or anything else, a silver certificate of the same amount shall be issued; that for every ounce of silver purchased a silver certificate must go out.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; there may go out a silver certificate representing the value of an ounce of silver at 50 cents, and there may go out a silver certificate representing silver at $1.29 an ounce.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield so that I may ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is there anything in the bill that provides, as to silver purchased by gold certificates or bonds of the country or otherwise, that silver certificates shall be issued against such purchases?

Mr. KING. Absolutely.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly read the language?

Mr. KING. The bill provides that for every ounce of silver purchased, no matter whether by bonds or by gold or by anything else, a silver certificate shall be issued.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the senior Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. We are dealing right now with one particular amendment. I intend at the proper time to answer some of the questions asked by the junior Senator from Nevada. We are not dealing with the amendment intended to be offered by the junior Senator from Nevada, but with the amendment now offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator will pardon me if I invite attention to the first sentence of section 5, as follows:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denomination as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3.

It seems to me that is a very plain and positive direction that there must be issued silver certificates at least equal to the cost of the silver.

I wish now to say just a brief word with reference to one matter which the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] has frequently mentioned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado on the amendment has expired. He has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I will use my time on the bill.

The Senator from Oklahoma has said repeatedly, and it is firmly fixed in his mind, that the bill will not make silver primary, basic, or standard money. My judgment is that there is no difference between the provision of the bill and the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma in that respect. I think it is a mistake to attempt to go into matters of definition. The question is, What will a silver dollar do and what will a silver certificate do, and not what is it called?

Under the bill and under the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma a silver certificate or a silver dollar may be used as legal tender to pay any debt of any kind. It may be used by the Government of the United States in the payment of its bonds. I do not know how we could make a dollar more usable than by making it full legal tender. I care not what it may be called. The Senator puts his defintion of primary money in this form: That that is only primary money which has the same value when it is stamped as a coin and when the stamp upon the equal amount of coin is defaced. We can take a certain gold coin today and mutilate it, and while it ceases to be a coin, yet it has the same value. I understood that to be his statement. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if I am correct?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If my amendment should prevail, thereafter silver certificates would be based upon the actual amount of silver in terms of gold. For instance, silver might be worth 50 cents an ounce. It would take 2 ounces of silver to be worth a dollar in gold. The silver certificate of the future would call for 2 ounces of silver when silver is 50 cents an ounce. If silver were $1 an ounce, it would take only 1 ounce of silver to represent the silver certificate. I propose to put the silver in the Treasury at its bullion, intrinsic value rather than at a fiat value, as the pending bill proposes to do.

Mr. ADAMS. My understanding of the effect of it is that the Senator's amendment will not make silver primary money. What he is proposing is to make silver certificates primary money. He is making a silver certificate of such kind that it will buy in the markets of the world in equal value, but he is keeping silver upon a commodity basis. The silver certificate today may be redeemable in 1 ounce of silver and tomorrow in 4 ounces of silver, while under the pending bill the silver certificate will be redeemable at all times in one standard silver dollar.

Instead of getting silver off the commodity basis, the Senator from Oklahoma is putting it squarely upon the commodity basis. I am afraid his amendment would have a tendency to demonetize rather than to remonetize silver, because the amendment offered by the Senator does not make silver primary money in any sense. It makes silver certificates redeemable in the commodity value of silver. The present bill makes silver certificates redeemable in definite quantities of definitely stamped silver. If the object which we hope for shall be accomplished in the rise of the price of silver, we will have standard silver dollars which will meet all the requirements of the Senator's definition of primary money.

Mr. President, I believe that covers the matter I wished to discuss. It seems to me it would be a mistake to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. I recognize, of course, the force of the arguments of the Senator from Oklahoma, which are based upon an amendment he would offer should his first amendment now pending be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). On this amendment I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH]. I understand that if he were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DICKINSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. I am advised, however, that if present he would vote as I have already voted; so I will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. I understand that if present he would vote in the same way that I have already voted, and I therefore will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], which I transfer to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and will allow my vote to stand.

I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] is detained on account of illness.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] is necessarily absent in attendance upon the funeral of the late Representative COFFIN.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are necessarily detained.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is detained at the White House, but, if present, would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. HEBERT. I announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE]; and

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] are necessarily absent, and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 65, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma was rejected.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer in lieu of section 2, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of section 2 as printed in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

That bimetallism be, and the same hereby is, reestablished as the monetary system of the United States; that is to say, both gold and silver shall henceforth be admitted to free and unlimited coinage as basic, primary money of ultimate redemption, as was done from 1789 to 1873, at such fixed ratio to each other as shall from time to time be established by law; and the President is hereby authorized and directed to proceed, under the powers conferred upon him by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, to carry this act into effect: Provided, That the ratio of silver to gold in the dollar shall not be fixed by the President at any time at more than 70 to 1 nor less than 16 to 1; and all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the amendment which I have sent to the desk specifically reestablishes silver as money. It declares for the same policy and system of bimetallism that existed up to 1873.

There is no practical difference between the amendment and the section as it stands in the bill, excepting that we are told by the advocates of the present bill that they are going to do exactly what the amendment provides shall be done—and I call the attention of the Senate to this fact:

There is nothing mandatory or compulsory or decisive in the present bill. If I may have the attention of the Senate, I will state what the present bill provides, because there seems to be a misapprehension on the part of so many Senators who have read the bill many more times than I have, but who certainly do not seem to catch the language which appears very decisive to my mind.

The bill says:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States, authorized by law, * * * upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest.

The fact that the Secretary is given the discretion to purchase whenever he thinks he ought to purchase, and not to purchase when he does not think he ought to purchase, and to purchase upon only such conditions as he thinks are to the public interest, is the same as though we wrote into the bill "whenever he thinks it is a good thing to do." That is what the bill means.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the amendment been printed?

Mr. LONG. The amendment has not been printed. I will have it read if the Senator was not in the Chamber at the time it was read by the clerk.

Mr. BORAH. I should prefer to see it. Has the Senator copies of it?

Mr. LONG. I will ask to have the amendment sent to the Senator from Idaho in order that he may see it.

In other words, we are now told that silver is at such a low value that it has to have a monetary standard not only lower than 16 and 28 to 1, but much lower than that. Silver is now selling at 45 cents an ounce. The old ratio was $1.29 an ounce. I have allowed a discretion in remonetizing silver of not more than 70 to 1 and of not less than 16 to 1. The only difference between the amendment I have offered and what is in the bill is that under the amendment, if it were enacted today, by law silver would become money tomorrow. Under the amendment it does not depend upon the ipse dixit of the Secretary of the Treasury. He has no discretion to keep silver from being money; but it is left within the capacity and within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury not to make the value of silver as money any more than the market of the world justifies today.

In other words, it will not be necessary to make a 45-cent ounce of silver a $1.29 ounce of silver tomorrow morning. It will only be necessary to make the silver of the present value, according to the discretion that is allowed to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The only difference made by this amendment is that silver will be money, based upon a value, the ratio of which is to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the silver valued as it is valued at the present date, and with gold valued as it is valued at the present date. This would mean that the law would amount to something.

I do not want to take issue with my friends, but I am compelled to note what was said by the junior Senator from Nevada. Every time we have had one of these silver-purchasing measures before us silver has gone down in price.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will give us the reason for that. Probably he knows.

Mr. LONG. I could not begin to tell the Senator the reason. I suppose the Senator knows.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think I do; but I do not think what the Senator has stated is accurate. I have the figures right before me, which I will read at the proper time. There is no use guessing at the facts. We have information as to the facts here.

Mr. LONG. The Senator probably had the information as to the facts when silver went down last year. I know the day the Senator introduced this silver bill silver went down. Perhaps it has gone back up since then. Perhaps there is some other reason. The fact is that we have not made anything out of it. What is 45 cents an ounce? There is no material gain from that standpoint.

If I may proceed, whether this is exactly according to what the Senator may think or not, the fact is, none the less, that last year we expected a material increase in the price of silver and a material use of silver. What has happened? We decreased the gold content of the dollar from 100 cents down to 59 cents. What was silver bringing last year, if I may inquire of my friend, at the time we decreased the gold content of the dollar? What was the price?

Mr. PITTMAN. At what date?

Mr. LONG. In September of last year, was it not? When was it we devalued the dollar? How much was silver selling for in September of last year?

Mr. PITTMAN. Somewhere around 30 cents.

Mr. LONG. The dollar today is worth only 59 cents, so silver should have advanced two-fifths, according to the argument, because we took two-fifths off the dollar. Two-fifths of 30 would be 12 cents, to be added. So, according to that, silver has not gone up to amount to anything based upon the present demonetized price of gold. At the most, it can be contended that silver has gone up from 1 to 2 to 3 points, which is practically nothing. It will fluctuate that much in a day or a week. The point is that after considering the devalued gold dollar, which is 28 or 29 to 1, instead of 16 to 1, there has been no appreciable increase in the price of silver.

As the junior Senator from Nevada said a moment ago, I am not concerned about helping silver; I am concerned about getting money to the people of this country who need it. My people do not produce any silver. I own no silver. My State is not a silver-producing State. But if we are to have a silver law, I appeal to my conservative brethren, who believe in truthfulness and explicit action by statute, to have it provided in the law that silver is to be money, and that its ratio with gold is to be fixed in accordance with what the value of silver is as compared with the value of gold, allowing bimetallism to work it up to what is the standard price. When it gets to $1.2929 we will reach the ideal point.

I hope that the amendment may be agreed to. It means that we are not undertaking to impose upon the Treasury the duty of buying at $1.29 silver that is worth 49 cents. The proposal merely is to give silver the status of money, and allow the discretion to remain in the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not care to consume all of my time. If I may have a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment, I will have nothing further to say. I ask for a year-and-nay vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]. I am informed that that Senator would vote as I desire to vote, and, therefore, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WHITE (when his name was called). On this amendment I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DICKINSON. On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HEBERT. I announce the following general pairs on this question: The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

I desire to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] are necessarily absent.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] is detained by illness.

I announce also that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] is absent, attending the funeral of the late Representative COFFIN, of Idaho.

I am also requested to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] is specially paired on this question with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. I am not advised as to how either Senator would vote if present.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 59, as follows:

So Mr. LONG's amendment was rejected.

EXTENSION OF TEMPORARY PLAN FOR DEPOSIT INSURANCE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. FLETCHER submitted a report, which was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 121) authorizing the President to return the mace of the Parliament of Upper Canada to the Canadian Government.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H.R. 4337. An act to amend the Judicial Code by adding a new section to be numbered 274D;

H.R. 8781. An act to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and to amend the Federal Aid Road Act, approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 9184. An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to sell the old Tenley School to the duly authorized representative of St. Ann's Church of the District of Columbia.

MONETARY USE AND PURCHASE OF SILVER

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment which was submitted by the Treasury Department to correct language in section 8. I send the amendment to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 7, at the end of line 3, to insert the following:

The Commissioner shall abate or refund, in accordance with regulations issued hereunder, such portion of any tax hereunder as he finds to be attributable to profits (1) realized in the course of the transferor's regular business of furnishing silver bullion for industrial, professional, or artistic use and (a) not resulting from a change in the market price of silver bullion, or (b) offset by contemporaneous losses incurred in transactions in interest in silver bullion determined, in accordance with such regulations, to have been specifically related hedging transactions; or (2) offset by contemporaneous losses attributable to changes in the market price of silver bullion and incurred in transactions in silver foreign exchange determined, in accordance with such regulations, to have been hedged specifically by the interest in silver bullion transferred.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I desire to explain the amendment briefly. The question arose as to whether or not under the section indicated the tax applied in a case where a processor bought bullion and between the time, for instance, of the purchase and delivery of the bullion to the processor for refinement the price had changed and he had attempted to protect himself by selling exactly the same number of ounces he had bought. The question was whether such a transaction would come within the taxing provisions.

It was not the intention, as I understand, of the Treasury Department in preparing this tax proposal to have it apply to anything except actual speculations in the buying and selling of bullion.

For instance, a producer sells silver en route to a smelter. It is paid for the day it is received at the smelter, although the silver is sold in the rock. The silver then has to go through the process of smelting and refining. After the bullion comes out of the ore it is impure. It has to go through the refinery.

It will probably be 6 weeks to 2 months before the buyer of the silver ore has it in bullion. In the meantime the price may drop 10 cents an ounce below what he paid for it, and, as he is not speculating in silver, he offsets that transaction by selling exactly the same number of ounces of silver that he buys, and then, if silver goes up or down, he is not affected by the transaction. The object of the amendment is to effect such cases as I have described.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has this amendment been referred to the committee at all?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; it has not.

Mr. JOHNSON. The other day there was a rule invoked when an amendment was presented, and it was contended it ought not to be considered at all because it had not been passed upon by any committee. I have not read the amendment; I am quite unable to follow the explanation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I tried to be brief with it. Here is the statement of the Treasury Department, which I think means exactly what I said, that those who are engaged in the processing of silver, from the time it is in the rough state until it is pure silver ready to be manufactured into jewelry, have to undergo a period of time when there is a fluctuation in the price of silver, and not being engaged in speculation and desirous of protecting themselves they do what is called "hedging"; they sell at the same time they buy.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. Two large concerns, the International Silver Corporation of Meriden, and one other in Connecticut, are very much interested in this tax. They are very large buyers of commercial silver for manufacturing of various articles. I wonder if this bill would except them from paying the tax? Assuming that they are not merely speculating in silver but that they are buying for manufacturing purposes, and the price of silver advances, they would probably sell that manufactured article at a higher price than they would have done if silver had not advanced; but is there any computed profit in that case that would be taxable at 50 percent?

Mr. PITTMAN. The tax applies solely to bullion and solely to a profit on the sale of bullion; not the sale of silver in any processed form.

Mr. WALCOTT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. In the first place, I think that the amendment of my colleague should be printed. I now call up and ask to have read the amendment I have heretofore offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask that my amendment be read at this time by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed on page 2, line 13, after the word "ounce", to insert a colon and the following:

And provided further, That in the event that silver certificates are not used originally or directly in payment for any silver purchased or acquired, then immediately after purchasing or acquiring any silver at home or abroad silver certificates shall be issued to the full amount as provided in this act, and such certificates shall be placed in actual circulation through the payment of governmental obligations.

Mr. McCARRAN. I now ask my colleague, who is in charge of this bill, if he will accept my amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not feel at liberty to accept it. May I ask a question? There is pending the amendment which I offered preceding this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. Does the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] desire to be heard on that amendment, or does he desire to offer his amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not understand that the last amendment, which is not printed, is offered now by my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood, and so ruled.

Mr. PITTMAN. If my colleague wants a vote on his amendment first, I will ask unanimous consent that I may temporarily withdraw my own amendment, and allow my colleague to present his amendment at this time.

Mr. McCARRAN. It was my understanding that that should be done.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent temporarily to withdraw my amendment which I just offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The senior Senator from Nevada temporarily withdraws his amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, there are those in this Chamber who believe honestly and sincerely that not only from the standpoint of their birthright but from the standpoint of a national advantage there should be a remonetization of silver. There are those who do not believe in the remonetization of silver. It is not a question, Mr. President, of what we can do for silver. That would mean doing something for two or three millions of toilers with their families. That might be swept aside as merely a local matter. What we are interested in here is, What can silver do for humanity at an hour and a time when humanity needs something to be accomplished? If we are right in one, we are right in the other.

The fact that I may come from a State which produces silver and that I might be denominated as one naturally inclined to enhance an industry within my State is not a thing that is national. It is a thing that is local. But what I am interested in is something that will accomplish results for the Nation to which you and I belong—a broader aspect and a more far-reaching atmosphere.

What are we dealing with here? A commodity? A something that may be bought and sold today on the stock market, kicked up and down on the board, bought right and left, sold short and long? I hope that is not true, because as long as that principle prevails then so long will we have destroyed something that belongs to the lowly and the humble; the masses of the people of this country.

Mr. President, from time almost beyond the writing of mankind to the present hour there have been two things which were recognized as basic by which the obligations of one man might be liquidated with another—a money of ultimate settlement. I do not care whether it came out of the sacred writings or whether it came by historic precedent, it had its place in the world and it has its place now. The one was gold and the other was silver. From time immemorial until the present silver has been the coin of the lowly, the money of the masses, the money of the poor.

What is the condition today? Have the poor of this country money with which to deal with their fellow men? If they had, we would not be detained here at this hour. It is because within the last year and a half the circulating medium of the country has been reduced $9.60 per capita—$9.60 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. Statistics bear out and prove that statement. It is not because we want to do something that will give more employment to the miner—though that may be uppermost in our hearts—we want to do something for the masses of the country, to bring them back so they may deal with their fellow men. When we have done that, we can adjourn the Congress, and national recovery will be a success without further action.

What does the bill propose, and what does my amendment propose? First of all, just a few moments ago, by way of inquiry put to the learned Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] at a time when he was arguing against the amendment of the able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], I asked him if it were true that silver certificates would be placed in circulation by the bill. The learned Senator made what I consider to be an indefinite answer.

If we buy all the silver in the world and put all the silver in the world in the Treasury of the United States, will we have enhanced the wealth of the man on the street? What is the object of legislation of this kind? Is it merely to put more metal away some place—metal that men declare to be money of ultimate redemption—or is it to put into circulation something with which the man who toils in the ditch today may pay the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker? The latter is my object, and I believe the latter is the object of every Member of this body.

It is not a question of how much gold we have stored away today—we have a corner on the gold of the world. We are the wealthiest nation in the world. We are a creditor nation. Yet there are millions upon millions starving, or, if they are not starving, it is because we are turning out of the Treasury of the country the money of the taxpayers to keep them off of starvation lists.

It is only a question of whether we shall make silver something with which men may deal with men and settle and liquidate their obligations. Shall it be a money of ultimate redemption, or shall it be a commodity? If it is only a commodity, then why not say that every grain of wheat in some granary has a monetary value? If it is only a commodity, why not deal with it accordingly? But if it is actually a money of ultimate redemption, let us hold it as such and, holding it as such, let us put it into circulation.

The learned senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] surprised me a few moments ago. He was in every meeting of the group of Senators who met, from the time we first came here in special session until this hour. He knows what the attitude of that group was. I was a little sorry at his tone in reply to me when I said that the Secretary of the Treasury had at no time evinced an attitude favorable to the remonetization of silver. I make that statement now, after repeated meetings with the Secretary of the Treasury. I am sorry to have to make it. I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury has any more use for silver as a money of ultimate redemption than the devil has for holy water, and that is not very much.

I do have faith, however, in the President of the United States. When he said to that group of Senators who assembled there in meeting that day that he, the President, proposed to go about this movement energetically and purposefully—proposed to buy silver and make it a circulating medium—I had faith in the Executive. Hence I have offered the amendment in good faith, not for the purpose of defeating the bill, because I propose to support the bill. My whole life, my whole being, is wrapped up in something that will bring to the men in the lowly walks of life the things that will give them an opportunity to deal with their fellow men. From my earliest life until the present time I have believed, and I now believe, in the remonetization of silver.

This measure now under consideration does not go so far as to remonetize silver. I wish it did. If this bill is a step in the right direction, it will have that effect if it will bring back the money of the lowly to the lowly—then, although I know it is not all that I want, I will vote for the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired. The Senator has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will take my time on the pending amendment of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the senior Senator from Nevada has been withdrawn. It is not the pending amendment. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. There is another amendment pending. Am I not right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed for 15 minutes on the bill, but there can be but one pending amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then I will take my time on the bill itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, were I less zealous in this matter, perhaps I might be less wrapped up in it.

I regret exceedingly that my colleague [Mr. PITTMAN] finds nothing in my amendment that he can adopt. It is indeed unfortunate; but the people of this country will find something in my amendment that they will adopt, and that is that they want, namely, a money circulating in this country and not a money tied up in the strong boxes of this country. I want a money that will circulate from John Smith to Bill Jones and pay the balance found to exist between them. We may call it the Mexican dollar, if we desire, or the mill dollar, if we desire, as it was called in former legislation, or we may call it a silver certificate. Whatever it may be, let it be a circulating medium that will pass from one man to another and thus meet the condition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would explain the operation of this amendment. I have not seen it. We have only heard it read. I think it has not been printed.

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; it has been printed.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator explain, then, what would happen under his amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue silver certificates. It does not provide that he shall issue silver certificates.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that in talking with Mr. Oliphant, who is one of the attorneys for the Treasury Department, he stated that he had looked up the question and that the term "issue", as used in this bill, meant to circulate the certificates. He stated that that would be his interpretation if he should be called upon to interpret the law, and that that is exactly what they intended to do, and that is what they would do.

Let me frankly say to the Senator, however, that it does not seem to me that the amendment offered by him could possibly do any harm, and, as a matter of fact, it would take away all doubt from the matter; and I am at a loss to understand why the Treasury Department should want to keep the amendment out of the bill. They say that the word "issue" means not only to issue the money but to put it into circulation. If that be true, then there can be no reason, it seems to me, why they should not be willing to accept an amendment which would require exactly what they say they are going to do.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly what I want the bill to say.

I was very much impressed with some questions propounded by the learned Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the very early consideration of this bill. They were addressed, as I recall, to section 1 or section 2 of the bill; and in his questions he said, "Well, why do you not say so? Why use so much language?" That is exactly what I want to do now—say just what we mean.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield. I hope I did not misquote the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator has not misquoted me, and I have had some doubt about the very provision which I think this bill undertakes to clarify. Like the Senator, I do not want to insert anything in this bill that will bring about its ultimate defeat; but as I understand now, since I have read it, the Senator's amendment does clarify and is really an answer to the questions that I propounded, as the Senator says.

Mr. McCARRAN. That was my intention.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see anything else in it. It seems to me the amendment is unobjectionable for that reason.

In other words, the object of the Senator's amendment, as I now see it, is that it would be certain, were any silver purchased, that the silver should somewhere bring about the issuance of silver certificates to the full amount of the silver involved; and that, as I understand, is one of the objects of this bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly the object of this amendment; and, as I take it from statements and word from the White House, that was the purpose and intent, and they said they would go about it zealously.

I submit the amendment to the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not think there is any disagreement whatever between the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and myself with regard to this matter.

As a matter of fact, at the last informal meeting of this informal committee with the Secretary of the Treasury and others on the 16th day of last month, when the Secretary announced to us that he desired further liberty in utilizing gold or gold notes or any other form of credit in buying silver, and that he did not wish to be bound solely by the use of silver certificates in the purchase of silver as we had provided in the informal draft, at that time, sitting there, I drafted this language and read it at the meeting; and I read it now to show the junior Senator from Nevada that I am in entire accord with him:

> But the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase silver with gold or any other currency or credit of the United States; but if purchases are made with any other specie, currency, gold, or credit other than silver certificates, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue silver certificates against such silver so purchased at the rate of $1 a certificate for each 371.25 grains of silver so purchased. Such silver certificates shall be paid out by the Treasury Department in the ordinary course of business to meet any expenses, liabilities of, or demands upon the Government. Such silver certificates and all other silver heretofore or hereafter issued shall be full legal tender for all debts, both public and private, and such legal-tender character shall be maintained.

I insisted on that, and that was written at the table there and was agreed to by all this informal committee; yet, as I say, the counsel for the Treasury Department wrote this letter, which I accepted:

> DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: Section 5 of the silver bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver certificates to an amount not less than the cost of the silver purchased under section 3. The legal effect under existing law of the words "to issue" silver certificates is that they must be not merely printed but also put into circulation.
> Very truly yours,
> HERMAN OLIPHANT,
> General Counsel to the Secretary.

I asked for a legal opinion from him upon that subject. I hold here a legal opinion prepared by the general counsel for the Treasury Department in which he cites numerous decisions of our Federal courts, and refers to numerous acts in which the word "issue" is used and interpreted and construed, and finally winds up by saying:

> The word "issue" has always been interpreted administratively as meaning to put in circulation in all Treasury operations.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Treasury is undoubtedly right about that, but I do not see any reason why there should be any doubt. Many of us who have been interested in the silver issue have felt that we wanted to be exceedingly explicit when we were dealing with silver legislation. All this amendment does is exactly what the Treasury Department says it intends to do, and what it will do. That is all the language means.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that this amendment anticipated a different form of bill from that which has come from the House.

Mr. McCARRAN. No; it was drawn for this very bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me read it:

> That in the event silver certificates are not used originally or directly in payment for any silver purchased or acquired, then immediately after purchasing or acquiring any silver at home or abroad, silver certificates shall be issued to the full amount as provided in this act.

That is already in the bill; but this is what is not in the bill:

> And such certificates shall be placed in actual circulation through the payment of governmental obligations.

I would have no objection to that. What I am trying to do, however, is to get through a bill that will become law. That is what I am striving for right now. I suggest that on page 3, line 5, after the numeral "3" and before the period, there be inserted the words from the Senator's amendment, "and such certificates shall be placed in actual circulation."

Mr. McCARRAN. I accept that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator, the junior Senator from Nevada says he accepts the modification of his amendment. If I understand it, he strikes out of his amendment, then, everything after the word "circulation", in line 8. Is that correct?

Mr. PITTMAN. He really adds the words I have read in another place. May I read it as it would be with the amendment added?

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will do that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Section 5 reads as follows:

> SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3.

I propose to add from the amendment of the junior Senator from Nevada the words "and such certificates shall be placed in actual circulation."

Mr. FESS. How would it be done?

Mr. PITTMAN. When any money is issued, it goes into the general fund of the Treasury, or into the special fund for distribution, and warrants drawn against it are paid out.

Mr. FESS. When it goes into the general Treasury it is in circulation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; because it is paid out on warrant. I would prefer to say "in actual circulation" than to try to prescribe how it should be done.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to observe that the provision would be a vain thing, so far as requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to place the certificates in actual circulation is concerned, unless we require him to keep them in actual circulation, and that is beyond the power even of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from Nevada modify his amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to know what the modification is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment as modified.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 5, after the numeral "3", it is proposed to add the words "and such certificates shall be placed in actual circulation."

Mr. NORRIS. Is that offered instead of the amendment heretofore offered by the junior Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. I suggested that we add that part of the amendment of my colleague to come in on line 5, at the end of the sentence.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may be recognized in my own time on this question, I will not take up the time of the senior Senator from Nevada, if he is through.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have finished.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the only question in my mind is as to whether this would accomplish the result expected. I myself think it is very desirable, when silver shall be purchased with money, let us say, now in existence and now in the Treasury, that silver certificates be issued for the silver that is purchased. Otherwise we would not expand the currency in any degree whatever.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is provided in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. There seems to be some doubt about that.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; the doubt is as to whether, if it is issued, "issued" means circulating. That is the doubt.

Mr. NORRIS. I was about to suggest to the junior Senator from Nevada that he strike out the words "through the payment of governmental obligations", because there might be some other way. The way he suggests would be the best method, possibly, but, if there were any other way just as good, it might be excluded if we left this language in. That is the reason why, personally, I should like to take it out.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, would the senior Senator from Nevada accept the amendment with the words "through the payment of governmental obligations" stricken out? It seems to me we are wasting much time over the use of words. We know what we are driving at, we know what we want, and it seems to me that the language of my amendment would accomplish exactly what we want. I would accept the suggestion of the learned Senator from Nebraska, because that would direct a specific avenue when there might be other avenues through which the same result might be accomplished.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I understand the junior Senator from Nevada to offer an amendment, on line 5, page 3, after the numeral "3" and before the period, to add the words "and such certificates shall be actually circulated."

Mr. McCARRAN. I should prefer to stand on my amendment up to the point where I have suggested striking out.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, that would merely be repeating what is already said in the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. If so, it could not do any harm.

Mr. PITTMAN. I object to having language in the bill that would be absurd. Let me read it again, if I have the time. This is what the bill provides:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3.

The amendment of the junior Senator from Nevada provides:

That in the event silver certificates are not used originally or directly in payment for any silver purchased or acquired, then immediately after purchasing or acquiring any silver at home or abroad silver certificates shall be issued to the full amount as provided in this act.

If we turn to the clause providing for the purchase of silver we find just exactly that provision.

Mr. McCARRAN. On what page?

Mr. PITTMAN. Page 2:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver, at home or abroad—

The language to which the Senator from Nebraska objected the other day—for present or future delivery, with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States authorized by law or with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I read that language, it does not provide that when the Secretary shall have purchased silver with other obligations of the Government or with any money in the Treasury he shall actually issue silver certificates for the silver he may have purchased.

Mr. PITTMAN. Listen as I read, and see whether it does.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point about which I wanted to be sure.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is one paragraph in which he is authorized to buy silver and issue silver certificates. If he buys it with silver certificates, that is settled.

Mr. NORRIS. That is settled.

Mr. PITTMAN. If he does not buy it with silver certificates, here is what is provided:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3.

There is the direct authority.

Mr. NORRIS. I asked the other day as to the phrase "in the face amount." Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury purchased it at 50 cents an ounce; the amount of the silver certificate would be different from what it would be if he purchased it at $1.29 an ounce.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish I could explain the matter to the Senator. If the Secretary of the Treasury purchases $100,000,000 worth of silver, no matter what price per ounce he pays for it, and he purchases it with gold notes, the Government is out $100,000,000, and it issues $100,000,000 worth of silver certificates with the left hand. That balances the expenditure. Then the question is not what is behind the silver but the amount he uses. There is no change whatever as to the character of the silver certificate or the amount of silver behind it in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as modified.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the leader on this side of the Chamber if it is his intention to finish this bill tonight and take a vote on its final passage.

Mr. PITTMAN. I assure the Senator that that is my understanding.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I had wished to say just a word concerning the amendment of my colleague. The roll call began earlier than I had expected. In fact, I had intended at one time to submit some observations on the silver question in general, but I have not been able to assemble the data, and I shall therefore spare the Senate that affliction. But I do wish to say, however, that there was one point in my colleague's amendment which commended itself to me, contrasted with the bill as a whole. It was his purpose to make the silver coin, which is called a dollar, worth a dollar; it was his desire to have that coin worth a dollar in silver bullion. In other words, he would have the silver coin worth as much in bullion as in coin. I think that is indispensable in a sound system of money, where you have any sort of standard money, or money, as we sometimes hear, of ultimate redemption, whatever that means.

I do not think that anything can be a standard of value or a measure of value that does not itself possess value, any more than a measure of length can exist without its having length. Anything else is a mere fiction. A $10 gold piece is worth as much, and should be worth as much, in bullion as in coin. If it should be melted down, as in the case where a house burned down, the bullion that was left would be worth as much as the coin before it was melted down. As I see it, that is indispensable to any sort of standard of value or standard money. I cannot bring myself to favor the coinage of silver, but if we are to have silver coins, their intrinsic value as metal should equal their nominal value as money. Otherwise you have a fiat silver money which is not different in kind or character from fiat paper money.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] offered an amendment which undertook to declare that it was the policy of the United States to establish, or to reestablish a system of bimetallism—the so-called "double standard."

Mr. President, as I understand the term "bimetallism", or the double standard, it means the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver into full legal tender money at a ratio fixed by law. Now if I had had the time and opportunity I had intended to demonstrate that such a thing is an impossibility, a financial impossibility, a monetary impossibility; that the thing cannot be done, that it has been tried times without number in history, and that it never did succeed in any age or in any country, except during such limited periods as when the market value of gold and silver happened to correspond with the mint value of gold and silver. That was an accident, and not a matter of policy or design.

More than 100 years ago, in 1832, a committee of the other House reported on the subject of coining gold and silver; it reported that they had not been able to find in history where the two metals ever circulated as unlimited legal tender under free and unlimited coinage, had circulated contemporaneously, concurrently, and indiscriminately. The House committee said that they had not been able to find an instance in human history where the two metals had circulated concurrently, contemporaneously, and indiscriminately.

I say that the same thing can be said today, with as much truth as then, with the one exception: those periods when the market value and the mint value happened to correspond.

Mr. President, the value of gold varies with reference to the value of commodities. The value of silver varies with reference to the value of other commodities. The value of gold varies with reference to the value of silver and, I might say, vice versa. And the double standard undertakes to fix a constant relationship between two variables. The thing cannot be done as a matter of design or as a matter of contrivance.

From 1602 to 1773 the French Government changed the ratio between gold and silver 26 times. Why? Because the commercial ratio changed, and they were trying to make the legal ratio correspond with the commercial ratio, trying to make the mint ratio correspond with the market ratio. It could not be done.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that in the reign of Napoleon, M. Colonne, the great minister of France, in 1803 prescribed the ratio by law under the direction of Napoleon at 15½ to 1, and that that ratio unimpaired, unweakened, unchanged, continued until 1873, when the United States demonetized silver and the mints of France were opened to the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver during that entire period?

Mr. GORE. Not Colonne—he was connected with the act of 1785—but Beranger and Gaudin. Mr. President, I know that what the Senator states is true only with this limitation, that they circulated concurrently only when the market and the mint ratio happened to correspond.

Here is what happened. From 1803, when Colonne had that law enacted by the Emperor, down to 1848, gold was at a permium over silver of from 1 to 1½, and at times as high as 2 percent, and they did not circulate together.

There were two reasons. The thing, I may say, appeared at times to work, owing to two exceptional circumstances. England was on the single gold standard at that time. Germany was on the single silver standard at that time. And when there was an excess of gold in France it flowed to England. When there was an excess of silver in France it flowed to Germany.

In addition to this, silver was leaving France and was going to the Orient. And from 1848 to 1858 France coined $600,000,000 worth of gold and lost $300,000,000 worth of silver—the silver left France and went abroad.

I repeat, the thing never had happened. The thing cannot happen. Whichever money is overvalued the people will use to pay their debts and will save, sell, or export the money which is undervalued as bullion. I quote from Horace White, a high authority, as to the effects of the act of 1803:

> Gradually the price of gold rose above the legal ratio, and that metal was exported to such an extent that Chevalier tells us that "25 years after that date (1803) the circulation consisted of silver only." Abundant proofs can be adduced showing that bimetallism did not exist in practice in France between 1830 and 1847. Mr. Giffin has published a table showing the premium on gold in Paris during every month of that period. This premium was at times as high as 2 percent. The contention of the bimetallists that the French law of 1803 kept the ratio steady at 15½ till 1873 is not supported by facts.

Take our own history. From 1792, when the Mint Act was passed and the ratio of 15 to 1 was enacted, silver was overvalued and gold was undervalued, and comparatively little gold was coined, because gold was worth more in the form of bullion than it was in the form of coin. Gold left the country.

From the acts of 1834 and 1837, when the metals were revalued and the value of the gold coin was changed, silver was then undervalued and had left the country. It was worth from 1 to 3 percent more in bullion than it was in coin. It emigrated. It went abroad. You might as well stop water from running down hill as to prevent an undervalued coin from leaving the country. It always has done so. It always will do it unless it is impounded. It defies even embargoes, penal statutes, and royal proclamations. It would not circulate; it would not stay in the country.

The junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] has referred with some eloquence to the money of our fathers—the money with which the poor man could pay and be paid. Mr. President, on the 1st day of May 1806, Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, by Executive order suspended and stopped the coinage of the silver dollar at our mint, and from 1806 to 1835 there was not a silver dollar coined in the United States—not one.

Mr. PITTMAN. Why, Mr. President?

Mr. GORE. Because there was an Executive order against it.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was because there was no silver in the United States.

Mr. GORE. Oh, there was silver, but the bulk of our metallic money was made up of foreign silver coins—Mexican coins, Spanish coins. They circulated and continued to circulate until the act of 1857, which demonetized them. They made up the bulk of our metallic circulation.

From 1792 to 1868 only 4,600,000 silver dollars were coined in the mint of the United States.

As far back as 1850 our mint coined $20,000,000 in gold, four times as much in that one year as there were silver dollars coined from 1792 to 1868. As far back as 1843 our mint coined $8,108,797.50 in gold—that much gold in a single year. Whereas during the 80 years from 1792, the year the mint was founded, down to 1873, the year that silver was demonetized, we coined only 8,108,797 silver dollars—that much in 80 years.

The acts of 1834 and 1837 undervalued silver and it would not stay in the country. Water flowed down hill. Silver flowed out of the country. Silver went out under an economic law that was stronger than acts of Congress. It went out under the Gresham law.

James I came to the throne in 1603. The third year of his reign he found that gold was undervalued and was leaving the country. He changed the mint ratio between gold and silver so that gold would remain in the country. Six years later he found that the market ratio had changed and gold was again leaving the country. Again he changed the mint ratio, but this time he undervalued silver and silver began to leave the country. In 1614 he issued a proclamation trying to stop both metals from leaving the country, a thing which had been tried in Spain and other countries for a century or more—an embargo on gold and silver.

James I multiplied—coined—proclamations in a vain effort to work a miracle—to make things that were different identical.

Mr. President, gold and silver for centuries were involved in a struggle for survival, survival of the fittest. At times it seemed that silver would survive as the fittest. At times it seemed that gold would survive as the fittest. In the long run, for reasons unnecessary to name, gold seemed to survive to win the verdict of commerce and of history.

I may say quite incidentally that 2 or 3 years ago, when silver was at its lowest, 25 cents an ounce, $6,000 worth of silver weighed a ton and $6,000 worth of gold, under the old value, weighed 25 pounds and under the new value, I believe, weighs about 15 pounds.

Mr. President, it seems to me this effort to return to silver and to make it money is the same as would be an effort to abandon the freight train and the trucks and return to the oxcart and the mule team and the stage coach. The stage coach did not surrender without a contest with the passenger train. It made a stubborn contest.

This effort to make money out of silver is the same as would be the effort to abandon the great steamships and return to the sailboat or to the galley. It may be said that the galley ought to survive. Perhaps it ought, but it did not. There is no use to argue now about what ought to have been. In far away India Gandhi is trying to reintroduce the spinning wheel and the hand loom and reestablish them amongst the people of India.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator think the United States ought to return to the single gold standard?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think it is not within the option or sole discretion of the United States. I hold no brief for the gold standard as inherently fit per se. The gold standard presupposes certain conditions which must exist before the gold standard itself can or will function. Those conditions have been destroyed, at least for the present, and the gold standard cannot and will not function. That does not prove that the gold standard is inherently ill adapted to existing times under proper conditions, if such a point can be raised. One of those conditions is the free flow of gold from country to country in response to demand. That essential condition does not now exist. I think that we ought to try—we ought to cooperate, if need be, in our effort to reestablish an international standard of value and payment of some sort. Such a standard is a condition precedent to the revival of world trade and the revival of world trade is a condition precedent to the revival of prosperity itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oklahoma on the amendment has expired. He has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. GORE. I shall take some of my time on the bill.

The locomotive is a pretty substantial engine in drawing weights and freight and passenger trains and freight trains, but it presupposes a track with crossties and steel rails. It would make a miserable showing to try to run it across the mountains and ravines and hills and hollows without a track. It would not work. The tractor itself is pretty well adapted to our prairie country and to other sections where there are no mountains, no ravines, no other obstruction; but the tractor will not operate across ravines and rocky ground and broken territory and new ground. It will not work there. Conditions essentially necessary for its successful operation are absent.

Conditions essential to the successful operation of the gold standard today are absent. Whether they will return, I do not know. I hold no brief for the gold standard. So far as silver is concerned, permit me to say again that it reminds me of Ghandi's efforts with reference to bringing back the spinning wheel. There is something pathetic in his efforts to resurrect the spinning wheel. The chances are he will not succeed. You cannot put the eagle back into its shell; and yet, his efforts are not far different in nature from the efforts which we witness here to raise silver from the dead and try to make a real money out of silver.

I admit that silver has every attribute of money except value. Silver has every attribute of money except value. I do not intimate that that makes any material difference. I simply allude to it incidentally.

Mr. President, there is another observation on the amendment just offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] which I wish to make. To force the silver certificates into circulation and make them go into circulation is one thing, but I think we ought to make them stay there. There is no use to qualify our omnipotence.

In the Senate we adopted the so-called "Borah amendment" July 22, 1932, authorizing national banks to issue national-bank notes on bonds bearing more than 2 percent interest. From that day, July 22, 1932, to the middle of December 1932, $135,000,000 of additional national-bank notes were issued under that amendment and applications were then pending for $35,000,000 more. The Federal Reserve notes of the country had contracted exactly $170,000,000 in the same time. Federal Reserve notes had shrunk exactly $170,000,000, corresponding exactly to the amount of the national-bank notes which had been added to the currency, plus the amount involved in applications then pending.

We cannot force money into circulation unless trade conditions require it and demand it and call for it. The Federal Reserve banks have today excess reserves of $1,650,000,000, which would support a superstructure of credit amounting to $16,000,000,000, which I believe would satisfy not only ordinary but extraordinary demands for money and for circulation.

This business is not subject to the ipse dixit of Congress. There are stronger laws than we can enact—economic laws which control these efforts and the operation of these policies.

I do not believe this measure as drawn is feasible. I do not believe it would be desirable as drawn, even if it were feasible. If this act is to be a dead letter, then it is useless. If it is not to be a dead letter, it might be harmful. I am afraid it would be more harmful than good.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as modified.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer a modification of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 5, after the period following the figure "3", it is proposed to add:

And such certificates shall be placed in actual circulation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as modified. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

On a division, the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I now renew the offer of the amendment which I withdrew temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7, at the end of line 3, it is proposed to insert the following:

The Commissioner shall abate or refund, in accordance with regulations issued hereunder, such portion of any tax hereunder as he finds to be attributable to profits (1) realized in the course of the transferor's regular business of furnishing silver bullion for industrial, professional, or artistic use and (a) not resulting from a change in the market price of silver bullion, or (b) offset by contemporaneous losses incurred in transactions in interests in silver bullion determined, in accordance with such regulations, to have been specifically related hedging transactions; or (2) offset by contemporaneous losses attributable to changes in the market price of silver bullion and incurred in transactions in silver foreign exchange determined, in accordance with such regulations, to have been hedged specifically by the interest in silver bullion transferred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, line 19, it is proposed to strike out the comma and the words "and before the tax under this subdivision takes effect."

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say that that is simply a correction of the language of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, a few days ago I submitted an amendment and had it printed. I wish to offer it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, between lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 8A. (a) Paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "any existing rate of duty" the following: "(except in the case of fermented liquors, spirits, and wines)."

(b) Paragraph (b) of such section is amended by inserting after the words "such an article" the following: "(except fermented liquors, spirits, and wines)."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will state the purpose and object and the only effect of the amendment. It relates to the measure passed last week authorizing the President to negotiate reciprocal treaties. I apprehend that the best bargains he could make, if it should be possible for him to make any, would involve a reduction of duty on fermented liquors, distilled liquors, and wines. At present the rates on those articles are so high that a reduction of 50 percent would really have no practical effect in actual operation.

For instance, the tariff on beer today is $1 a gallon. I believe that would be $50 a barrel. On distilled spirits, 100 proof, the tariff is $5 a gallon, and is graduated up from that point according to the alcoholic content. The present tariff on still wines is $1.25 a gallon. On sparkling wines it is $6 a gallon up to 24-percent alcoholic content, from which point they take the classification of distilled spirits.

I had thought that to the Senators on the other side and to the industrial communities of the country, if these trade agreements are to be negotiated, the least harmful reductions that could be made would relate to spirits of this kind—fermented liquors, distilled spirits, wine, and the like—and that reductions could be made with respect to these articles and perhaps result in the enlargement of foreign markets for our exports.

I may say that I mentioned this matter to the President, and, as I understood it, met with his favor. He suggested that I confer with Mr. Choate on the subject, which I did, and the proposal met with his favor. I do not see how there could be any substantial objection to it. Certainly there could be none to allowing it to go to conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he considers this amendment germane to the measure under consideration.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will explain—and I owe the silver Senators an apology—that I searched the calendar for a House bill which contained a provision in regard to taxation, and this is the only such bill I could find on the calendar. Otherwise, I should have offered the amendment to some other bill. So far as I know, this is the only bill now pending on the calendar which contains a taxation provision, which must of necessity originate in the House. If there is another such bill on the calendar at this time or one in immediate prospect, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KING. Why does not the Senator have the bill introduced in the House and secure action there? It seems incongrous to attach a bill dealing with liquors to this important measure dealing with our monetary system.

Mr. GORE. I think it might strengthen the Senator's bill to give it a little spirits. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHEELER. Is not this amendment subject to a point of order, in that it raises revenue, and is not subject to be added as an amendment to this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that if that question should be raised it would have to be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that section 8 of the bill is a taxation provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana raise the question?

Mr. WHEELER. I will not raise the question if it has to be submitted to the Senate. I think, however, the amendment will not strengthen the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, at the proper place in the bill, the following:

"PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES BEFORE MATURITY

"SEC. 509. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized and directed to pay to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of the certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), the amount of the face value of the certificate as computed in accordance with section 501.

"(b) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Veterans' Administration nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the Administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount of the face value of the certificate the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued prior to October 1, 1931.

"(d) Upon payment under this section the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(e) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor, filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate, (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

"(f) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this section on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is made but before the negotiation of the check in payment, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation, if the application is filed (1) before the death occurs, or (2) after the death occurs, but before the mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501.

"(g) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this section, has been filed before the maturity of the certificate, and the application cannot be found, such application shall be resumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

"SEC. 510. If, at the time this section takes effect, a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302, to receive at his option either the certificate under section 501 or payment of the amount of the face value thereof under section 509.

"SEC. 511. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the exercise of his powers to make regulations for payment under section 509 shall to the fullest extent practicable provide a method by which veterans may present their applications and receive payment in close proximity to the places of their residence."

SEC. 2. (a) Payment of the face value of adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, shall be made in United States notes not bearing interest. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue such notes in such amount as may be required to make such payment, and of the same wording, form, size, and denominations as United States notes issued under existing law, except that the wording thereon shall conform to the provisions of this act. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Secretary of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed jointly to prescribe rules and regulations for the delivery of such notes in payment under section 509 or 510 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended.

(b) United States notes issued pursuant to the provisions of this act shall be lawful money of the United States and shall be maintained at a parity of value with the standard unit of value fixed by law. Such notes shall be legal tender in payment of all debts and dues, public and private, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received shall be reissued. Such notes, when held by any national banking association or Federal Reserve bank, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve. The provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the act of March 14, 1900, as amended (U.S.C., title 31, secs. 314 and 408), and section 26 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 31, sec. 409), are hereby made applicable to such notes in the same manner and to the same extent as such provisions apply to United States notes.

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the index number of the wholesale all-commodity prices rises above the index number of such prices for the years 1921 to 1929, as computed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the following methods for contracting the issues of currency in the United States shall be in force and effect, in the manner and to the extent prescribed in subsection (b) of this section:

(1) Abolishment of the circulation privilege extended to certain bonds of the United States under the provisions of section 29 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, and retirement of such bonds as security for circulating notes as rapidly as practicable.

(2) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of national-bank circulating notes, and the retirement of such notes from circulation as rapidly as practicable.

(3) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of Federal Reserve notes secured by direct obligations of the United States.

(4) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of Federal Reserve notes secured only by gold or gold certificates.

(5) Termination of the issuance and reissuance of Federal Reserve notes secured by notes, drafts, bills of exchange, acceptances, or bankers' acceptances which are not issued in direct benefit of commerce, industry, or agriculture.

(b) Any such method of contracting currency issues shall be applicable when the Secretary of the Treasury finds that its application is necessary in order to maintain the index number of wholesale all-commodity prices at the approximate level of the index number of such prices for the years 1921 to 1929 and issues an order setting forth such finding. Each such order shall prescribe such rules and regulations as are necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this section with respect to the method of contraction made applicable in the order. The Secretary shall make such methods applicable only in the order in which they are set forth in subsection (a) of this section, but he shall make such methods applicable as rapidly as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. When any such order is issued with respect to Federal Reserve notes, the Federal Reserve Board shall take such action as may be necessary to facilitate the enforcement of the order.

SEC. 4. Section 505 (authorizing annual appropriations ending with the year 1946 for the payment of adjusted-service certificates) of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, except the first sentence thereof, is hereby repealed. Amounts in the adjusted-service certificate fund are hereby authorized to be made available for the expenses of printing and engraving United States notes issued under this act, for paying fractional parts of a dollar which cannot be paid in United States notes issued under the provisions of this act, and for paying the principal and interest on or in respect of loans pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c) of section 509 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I am informed that if that Senator were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I feel myself at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to repeat the announcement of the absence of the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] on account of illness.

I also desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] in attendance on the funeral of the late Representative COFFIN, of Idaho.

I also announce that the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is detained by illness.

I also announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are necessarily absent.

I also desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH];

(As to this pair, see explanatory statement of Senator FESS in Senate proceedings of June 12, 1934, p. 11107.)

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. CAREY (after having voted in the affirmative). I find I have a special pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] on this question. Not knowing how that Senator would vote if present, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 51, as follows:

So Mr. SHIPSTEAD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I move to strike out section 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 8, as amended, as follows:

SEC. 8. Schedule A of title VIII of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended (relating to stamp taxes), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"10. Silver, etc., sales and transfers: On all transfers of any interest in silver bullion, if the price for which such interest is or is to be transferred exceeds the total of the cost thereof and allowed expenses, 50 percent of the amount of such excess. On every such transfer there shall be made and delivered by the transferor to the transferee a memorandum to which there shall be affixed lawful stamps in value equal to the tax thereon. Every such memorandum shall show the date thereof, the names and addresses of the transferor and transferee, the interest in silver bullion to which it refers, the price for which such interest is or is to be transferred and the cost thereof and the allowed expenses. Any person liable for payment of tax under this subdivision (or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for any such person) who is a party to any such transfer, or who in pursuance of any such transfer delivers any silver bullion or interest therein, without a memorandum stating truly and completely the information herein required, or who delivers any such memorandum without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both. Stamps affixed under this subdivision shall be canceled (in lieu of the manner provided in sec. 804) by such officers and in such manner as regulations under this subdivision shall prescribe. Such officers shall cancel such stamps only if it appears that the proper tax is being paid, and when stamps with respect to any transfer are so canceled, the transferor and not the transferee shall be liable for any additional tax found due or penalty with respect to such transfer. The Commissioner shall abate or refund, in accordance with regulations issued hereunder, such portion of any tax hereunder as he finds to be attributable to profits (1) realized in the course of the transferor's regular business of furnishing silver bullion for industrial, professional, or artistic use and (a) not resulting from a change in the market price of silver bullion, or (b) offset by contemporaneous losses incurred in transactions in interests in silver bullion determined, in accordance with such regulations, to have been specifically related hedging transactions; or (2) offset by contemporaneous losses attributable to changes in the market price of silver bullion and incurred in transactions in silver foreign exchange determined, in accordance with such regulations, to have been hedged specifically by the interest in silver bullion transferred. The provisions of this subdivision shall extend to all transfers in the United States of any interest in silver bullion, and to all such transfers outside the United States if either party thereto is a resident of the United States or is a citizen of the United States who has been a resident thereof within 3 months before the date of the transfer or if such silver bullion or interest therein is situated in the United States; and shall extend to transfers to the United States Government (the tax in such cases to be payable by the transferor), but shall not extend to transfers of silver bullion by deposit or delivery at a United States mint under proclamation by the President or in compliance with any Executive order issued pursuant to section 7 of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. The tax under this subdivision on transfers enumerated in subdivision 4 shall be in addition to the tax under such subdivision. This subdivision shall apply (1) with respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion after the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and (2) with respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion on or after May 15, 1934, and prior to the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, except that in such cases it shall be paid by the transferor in such manner and at such time as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulations prescribe, and the requirement of a memorandum of such transfer shall not apply.

"As used in this subdivision—

"The term 'cost' means the cost of the interest in silver bullion to the transferor, except that (a) in case of silver bullion produced from materials containing silver which has not previously entered into industrial, commercial, or monetary use, the cost to a transferor who is the producer shall be deemed to be the market price at the time of production determined in accordance with regulations issued hereunder; (b) in the case of an interest in silver bullion acquired by the transferor otherwise than for valuable consideration, the cost shall be deemed to be the cost thereof to the last previous transferor by whom it was acquired for a valuable consideration; and (c) in the case of any interest in silver bullion acquired by the transferor (after April 15, 1934) in a wash sale, the cost shall be deemed to be the cost to him of the interest transferred by him in such wash sale, but with proper adjustment, in accordance with regulations under this subdivision, when such interests are in silver bullion for delivery at different times.

"The term 'transfer' means a sale, agreement of sale, agreement to sell, memorandum of sale or delivery of, or transfer, whether made by assignment in blank or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or any other evidence of transfer or sale; or means to make a transfer as so defined.

"The term 'interest in silver bullion' means any title or claim to, or interest in, any silver bullion or contract therefor.

"The term 'allowed expenses' means usual and necessary expenses actually incurred in holding, processing, or transporting the interest in silver bullion as to which an interest is transferred (including storage, insurance, and transportation charges, but not including interest, taxes, or charges in the nature of overhead), determined in accordance with regulations issued hereunder.

"The term 'memorandum' means a bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of a transfer.

"The term 'wash sale' means a transaction involving the transfer of an interest in silver bullion and, within 30 days before or after such transfer, the acquisition by the same person of an interest in silver bullion. Only so much of the interest so acquired as does not exceed the interest so transferred, and only so much of the interest so transferred as does not exceed the interest so acquired, shall be deemed to be included in the wash sale.

"The term 'silver bullion' means silver which has been melted, smelted, or refined and is in such state or condition that its value depends primarily upon the silver content and not upon its form."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, section 8 is the objectionable feature of the bill. It proposes to penalize anyone who has bought any silver in the past and who shall buy any in the future. The purpose of the bill is to raise the price of silver. This provision would tax anybody who dared to deal in silver.

I think the general sentiment of the Members of this body is almost unanimous that this section should be stricken out. I understand that some of the officials of the Treasury Department insist on its being retained, but the general sentiment in the Senate is that it ought to be stricken out.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana on which the yeas and nays are requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], I vote "nay."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], who would, if present, as I understand, vote "yea", I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, has the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio; but I understand he has been specially paired on this question, so I will let my vote stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I regret to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I desire to announce also that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] is necessarily absent attending the funeral of the late Representative COFFIN, of Idaho.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

I also desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH].

I also announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—29

Ashurst	Duffy	McCarran	Thomas, Okla.
Bankhead	Frazier	McGill	Townsend

Johnson	Overton	Tydings

So Mr. LONG's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Several Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). On this question I have a special pair with the Senator from California

[Mr. JOHNSON]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. If present, the Senator from Illinois would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]. I understand on this question he would vote "yea" if present. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I must withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and vote "yea." I am advised that if the Senator from Pennsylvania were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I desire to announce also that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate: The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

I wish to announce the following pairs on this question: The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH].

I am advised that if present the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] would vote "yea", and that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I regret to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate: The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Flordia [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] is absent attending the funeral of the late Representative COFFIN.

The result was announced—yeas, 55, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—55

Adams	Caraway	King	Overton
Ashurst	Clark	La Follette	Pittman

So the bill was passed.

ANNUAL CONSIDERATION OF PERMANENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9410) providing that permanent appropriations be subject to annual consideration and appropriation by Congress, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9410) providing that permanent appropriations be subject to annual consideration and appropriation by Congress, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

RETIREMENT SYSTEM FOR RAILROAD EMPLOYEES

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, a few days ago I gave notice, on behalf of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and myself, that at the conclusion of the consideration of the silver bill I should move to take up the bill (S. 3231) to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] whether or not we will have an opportunity in the very near future to consider that bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I expect the bill referred to by the Senator from West Virginia will be taken up in the early future. I can make no agreement now about the matter, but I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that it is my expectation that the bill to which he refers will be taken up in the early future.

Mr. HATFIELD. Very well.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. O'MAHONEY, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 3723) to amend the Mineral Lands Leasing Act of 1920 with reference to oil- or gas-prospecting permits and leases, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1378) thereon.

Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was recommitted the bill (H.R. 9046) to discontinue administrative furloughs in the Postal Service, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1379) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 134) to simplify the administration of air-mail routes and contracts, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1380) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the following nominations:

Charles J. Baker, of South Carolina, to be collector of customs for customs collection district no. 16, with headquarters at Charleston, S.C., in place of Frederick G. Davies;

Bolon B. Turner, of Arkansas, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for term of 12 years from June 2, 1934, vice William C. Lansdon, term expired; and

J. Russell Leech, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for term of 12 years from June 2, 1934 (reappointment).

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Charles P. Smith, of Massachusetts, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for term of 12 years from June 2, 1934 (reappointment).

Mr. DILL, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of Clyde L. Seavey, of California, to be a member of the Federal Power Commission for the remainder of the term expiring June 22, 1935, vice George Otis Smith.

Mr. BLACK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Carlisle W. Higgins, of North Carolina, to be United States attorney, middle district of North Carolina, to succeed John R. McCrary, whose resignation is effective July 1, 1934.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the following nominations:

Charles W. Robertson, of South Dakota, to be United States marshal, district of South Dakota, to succeed Chester N. Leedom, whose term expired June 10, 1934; and George Philip, of South Dakota, to be United States attorney, district of South Dakota, to succeed Olaf Eidem, whose term expired June 10, 1934.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

ALFRED YEISER—RECONSIDERATION OF CONFIRMATION

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the nomination of Alfred Yeiser to be postmaster at Palmyra, Pa., was confirmed on Saturday, June 9, 1934, may be reconsidered and that the nomination recommited to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TEMPORARY PLAN FOR DEPOSIT INSURANCE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the conferees have made their report on Senate bill 3025, the bank-deposit insurance bill, and I desire to give notice that I expect to call it up for consideration tomorrow morning.

FEDERAL HOME LOANS—ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN H. FAHEY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able and enlightening address made by Hon. John H. Fahey, Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, over a Nation-wide radio network on May 1, 1934, in explanation of loans made by the home-loan bank.

There being no objection, the address was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL HOME LOANS EXPLAINED

It was my privilege to speak to the radio-forum audience just 5 months ago on the subject of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I described its purpose in helping to save the urban homes of more than half a million American families who were in serious danger of losing them through foreclosure.

I also mentioned the obstacles which the Corporation faced in the flood of applications for relief that had come to us from home owners who were not in distress. They were, therefore, not eligible for loans from the Corporation. Their applications have hampered the very urgent job of our State and branch offices in handling hundreds of thousands of applications for loans from home owners who were desperately in need of assistance from the Corporation.

Now I wish to cover a broader field than merely the relief aspect of home financing. I would like to discuss what the Federal Government is doing for the benefit and protection of all home owners, including the 9,000,000 who are not in financial difficulty at all. Nearly everyone who owns his home has been obliged to postpone the ordinary repairs on his property because of hard times, reduced income, and the acute scarcity of home-mortgage money during the past few years.

It is a timely subject, because President Roosevelt has recently signed a new act of Congress which is likely to have very definite results in creating new employment in the building trades and in making Federal and private home-mortgage money available in larger volume. It should also be effective in preventing the abuses that developed under earlier legislation and in stimulating the healthy revival of private investment in loans that are based upon the best of all possible security; that is, conservative first mortgages on American homes.

Before I deal with this new legislation and what it means, let me first describe the ways in which the three different agencies under the supervision of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board are attacking this whole question of restoring home ownership and home finance to normal stability.

One of these three methods is represented by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which is strictly a relief agency. Most of you are familiar with its work of helping hard-pressed home owners by exchanging their present mortgage indebtedness for new loans made to them by the Corporation. When I spoke on this program last November, the Corporation had made loans to about 16,000 home owners, in the amount of $43,000,000. As a result of the progress since then, the Corporation has now made loans to more than 200,000 different home owners in the amount of over $600,000,000. More than $50,000,000 in loans are now being closed every week.

In addition to these 200,000 cases where relief has already been granted and the tragedy of foreclosure avoided, there are 470,000 other home owners who are no longer under the immediate threat of foreclosure because their applications are being handled, even though the loans are not yet closed. Our task is far from finished. The accomplishment so far simply gives assurance that we no longer face, as we did a year ago, the risk of a great uncontrollable wave of default and foreclosure upon half a million or more homes, with serious problems for the financial institutions which have lent billions of dollars on home mortgages.

It should be kept in mind that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is purely an emergency operation, dealing directly with the home owner. It is only one of three steps which the Government has taken through the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to restore health, security, and activity to American home building and home ownership. The two other steps are not emergency measures, but are permanent undertakings which are intended to make home mortgage finance safer and more economical for investors and borrowers and to release money for employment in repair and construction work that has been long delayed.

Of these two permanent agencies, the first is the Federal Home Loan Bank System. It was formed by act of Congress in July 1932, and now embraces more than 2,400 building-and-loan associations, savings banks, and other private home-financing institutions in a great credit reserve system. It is similar in purpose and operation to the Federal Reserve System, except that it is confined strictly to home mortgage finance, and has nothing whatever to do with commercial credits. The Home Loan Bank System serves under the Federal Home Loan Bank Board through 12 regional home-loan banks, located throughout the United States. Each of these regional banks serves two or more States. By membership in the system an institution makes its own mortgage assets more liquid because they can be used as collateral to secure loans from the Federal bank of its district. Such advances can be used in making additional mortgage loans to home owners for repairs and new building. The present members have borrowed more than $100,000,000 from these banks, and their line of credit entitles them to borrow over $120,000,000 more.

The second permanent governmental agency administered by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board is represented by the Federal savings-and-loan associations. A Federal savings-and-loan association is a local, mutual savings institution. It is very similar to the familiar type of building-and-loan association, except that it operates under a Federal charter and under strict Federal supervision and regulation. It is in that respect an entirely new method for the encouragement of long-term savings, which in turn are lent to home owners on sound mortgage security. Its shares are bought by thrifty people, either in outright lump sums at the par value of $100 a share or in installment payments as low as 50 cents per share per month. A Federal savings-and-loan association is privately managed by local business and professional men of recognized judgment and experience. Every shareholder have a voice in its management and operation.

It is in no sense a Federal enterprise, any more than a national bank is. The Federal Government has recognized the soundness of these institutions, however. It expects to invest its own funds in their shares, in order to make more money available for conservative home loans in large and small communities throughout the United States. Congress provided for the establishment of the Federal savings-and-loan associations last June. Already, nearly 300 of these institutions are in operation. One of them was recently organized in New York City. Others have been chartered in Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, Cleveland, St. Louis, and in hundreds of smaller communities in 34 different States. Within the next year or two, several hundred more will undoubtedly be established in other towns and cities. Some will be new associations. Others will be old established building-and-loan associations, formerly under State charter, which will convert themselves into Federal savings-and-loan associations because of the safeguards and advantages which their shareholders would gain by such conversion.

As it continues to develop in size and membership, the Federal Home Loan Bank System will be an increasingly strong source of protection to all home mortgage borrowers and lenders. It makes home credit more liquid and more flexible. In doing so, it corrects the past difficulty which has led to the freezing up of sound mortgage assets held by financial institutions. That difficulty was that the depositor wanted his money on short notice at the very time when it was difficult to convert such long-term indebtedness as a mortgage into cash at its face value. Membership in the Home Loan Bank System makes it relatively easy for a thrift or home-financing institution to use its own mortgage assets as collateral for advances from a Home Loan bank and thus create new credit with which to meet any emergency or any severe scarcity of private mortgage funds.

Now, with regard to the second permanent Federal agency in home finance, the Federal savings-and-loan associations. Without wishing to assume the role of prophet, I venture to express the belief that these institutions are likely to go far in assuring a sounder and more adequate source of private funds for home financing. The public is already becoming familiar with their investment merits and the safeguards which they offer to large and small savings. In the towns in which such associations have already been chartered, their shares have proved attractive to thrifty people. The purpose of these mutual institutions to furnish local mortgage money has brought them the endorsement of leading citizens in all sections. Many such men are now serving as directors of such associations as a matter of constructive civic enterprise.

Before I discuss the new amendments to the Home Loan Act passed by Congress and signed on April 27 by President Roosevelt, I wish to call your attention to a very important change which is being brought about in American home mortgage loans, largely as a result of these three Federal undertakings and which I have just explained. The change to which I refer probably means very general abandonment of the old-style home mortgage which was made out for a term of 1, 3, 5, or 7 years and fell due in full at maturity date. That type of mortgage is being replaced by an entirely different form of loan which is safer for the lender and more convenient for the home-owner borrower.

This new class of mortgage is not really new at all. It has been employed for over a century in most European nations and by American building-and-loan associations, but it has not been widely used by other lenders in this country. It is known as the amortized loan. On such a loan the borrower does not have to pay off the entire principal at maturity within a short period of years. Instead, he pays it off gradually, month by month, from the very time his loan is made until the principal has been entirely repaid at the end of from 7 to 15 or 20 years.

This type of loan is used exclusively by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and by the Federal savings-and-loan associations. It is the type of loan on which the Federal home-loan banks are empowered to advance a larger ratio against underlying property values than on any other type of mortgage.

To illustrate the superiority of the amortized loan, let us take a specific example. A home owner with a straight mortgage for $3,000 at 6 percent pays $90 every 6 months as interest. At the end of only 3 years he is obliged to pay off or to renew his entire $3,000 principal. If the loan falls due in a time of general depression or of reduced personal earnings, the home owner will have serious difficulty in paying or renewing it, and may lose his home through foreclosure.

If, on the other hand, the home owner made his $3,000 loan at the same interest rate of 6 percent on a 15-year amortized basis, he would simply pay $25.32 each month as combined principal and interest for 15 years. He never has to make a single payment of more than $25.32 a month. At the end of the 15 years he has paid off the entire $3,000.

The wide-spread use of the short-term mortgage loan by the banks and other mortgage lenders has been one of the principal causes for the difficulties of home owners in recent years and has intensified the depression greatly. I suggest that you bear in mind the vital importance of this evolution toward the amortized loan as a stronger and more practical form of investment, to say nothing of its desirability for the borrower himself.

Now let us consider the new legislation which has just been passed by Congress to amend the Home Owners' Loan Act. It greatly strengthens the entire structure of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal home-loan banks, and the Federal savings-and-loan associations. Five features of this amendment are of special importance to home owners.

First of all, the United States Government has now placed its full and unconditional guaranty on both principal and interest of the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which until now have been guaranteed as to interest only. This change means that any lender who has been carrying a home mortgage which was in default or in serious difficulty may now effect the exchange of that mortgage for a bond that is a direct obligation of the United States, provided the new loan is approved by Corporation officials.

In that connection the second most important provision of the new act is one which strictly limits loans made by the Corporation to those home owners who were in involuntary default on their mortgages as far back as June 13, 1933, or whose default, if it took place at a later date, was due to circumstances entirely beyond the borrower's control, such as unemployment. The Corporation absolutely will not make loans unless the applicant can prove that such default has developed in spite of everything that he could do to avoid it.

This new restriction automatically limits the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to loans where relief is actually needed. It makes it impossible for either a borrower or lender to take unfair advantage of the Corporation without incurring the risk of severe penalties for misrepresentation. It means that a home owner who deliberately commits default on his original mortgage in order to get a loan from the Corporation at a lower rate of interest cannot obtain the loan. He simply wrecks his credit standing in his own community by applying for such assistance. By such willful default and repudiation he also runs the prompt risk of foreclosure action and the loss of his home.

This part of the amendment likewise prevents a lender from bringing unfair pressure on the borrower by asking him to reduce the principal of his loan when that loan already is in sound condition. In recent weeks because of the high cash value of the Corporation bonds, certain lenders have tried to force their borrowers into distress by demanding a reduction of the principal of their loans when there was no good reason for such action, and have urged borrowers "to apply for help from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation." The new amendment puts a stop to this.

The third vital section of the new amendment authorizes $200,000,000 to be advanced by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for repairs and modernization of the properties on which it makes loans. Nearly all of the half million homes on which the Corporation expects to grant loans will require some expenditure for repair and maintenance to make up for long-deferred upkeep and the effect of wear and tear on the property.

A surprising proportion of our American homes are today a long way from being what they should be. In a country possessing the wealth and resources which we command our people should have the best homes in the world at the lowest cost. In dealing with the housing problem for people of moderate income we are far behind some of the older European countries. A large proportion of our present homes can be improved greatly and brought up to date at very moderate cost.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation can now advance money for this work on the homes on which it makes loans wherever the situation of the borrower justifies this course. It would be unwise for the Corporation to encourage people to assume new debts which they would be unable to pay. It is not helpful to entice a man into contracting a debt he can never discharge and thus add to his anxiety and trouble. The Corporation does not intend to pursue such a policy. It will, however, be prepared to finance within reasonable limits the improvement and modernization of the homes on which it takes mortgages. This undertaking should be helpful in demonstrating to many communities what surprising things may be done to an old house at little cost to make it more modern and livable.

This $200,000,000 fund is restricted to a relatively small proportion of home owners in this country. At the same time it represents the equivalent of employment for not less than 125,000 men for a period of 1 year, to be engaged in labor on these houses or in the manufacturing and transportation of materials.

The fourth change brought about by this new amendment deals with Federal savings-and-loan associations. I have explained that the United States Government, in recognition of the soundness of these institutions, is permitted to invest its own funds in the shares of these associations. In the past the Government could not subscribe for more than $100,000 in the shares of any one Federal savings-and-loan association.

Under the new law, the Treasury may buy full-paid income shares of such an association up to 75 percent of the entire amount subscribed by private shareholders and the Government together. I need hardly emphasize what this means in increasing the supply of mortgage money available to home owners throughout the United States. It means, for example, that an established building-and-loan association, with $5,000,000 in resources that is converted into a Federal savings-and-loan association, would have access to Federal participation up to $15,000,000. In other words, four times as much money is made available for home loans in its vicinity as is supplied simply by local private savings.

Another important change effected by this new amendment is that it will no longer be possible for borrowers from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to exercise the right to postpone all payments on principal up to June 1936 as has been the case in the past. All borrowers, except in proven necessitous cases, will be obliged to make combined payments of principal and interest each month. It was found that many borrowers who were well able to make principal payments had abused the privilege of deferring payments when there was no good reason for doing so. Bear in mind that the monthly payment required for both principal and interest is only $7.91 for each $1,000 of loan. The average loan so far made by the Corporation, among 200,000 borrowers, is slightly more than $2,900, on which the combined principal and interest installment each month is less than $23.

You will see, therefore, that the Corporation is not only saving hundreds of thousands of homes for their owners, but it is enabling them to pay off their mortgages on very easy terms. The home owners who receive such generous help should not invite future trouble by failing to pay off their debts as rapidly as they can. The Corporation does not intend to be unjust to any borrower, but neither does it propose to allow the Government to be imposed upon.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation is but one of the many constructive agencies which owe their existence to the statesmanship and foresight of our President. His interest in the home ownership problem is long standing and well known. Despite the many tremendous questions the President is called upon to face from day to day, the housing problem is never put aside. Whenever it requires his personal attention the time is made available for its consideration. Under such encouragement the Corporation is carrying forward a work of home protection and refinancing such as no country has ever before done for its people. It is not only entitled to the support of all right-minded citizens, but it certainly merits the prompt payment of obligations by those who are benefited.

It is hartening to those engaged in this work to observe not only the appreciation of the vast majority of those who have been aided, but their observance of the letter of their contract with their Government. We received hundreds of thousands of payments on loans even before the bills had been sent out.

In conclusion, may I offer a word of encouragement for home owners and prospective home owners who in the recent past have had difficulty in obtaining mortgage loans for repairs or new construction. Our Board in Washington is, of course, in close touch with thousands of home-financing institutions throughout the country. Within the past few weeks we have been informed that private capital in increasing amounts is being made available in many parts of the country for sound loans to responsible home owners. Private savings invested in such institutions, supplemented by the resources of the Federal savings-and-loan associations and of the Federal Home Loan Bank System, are expected to remove the most serious obstacle to urgently needed home building and repair which has faced American home owners during the past 4 years—namely, the scarcity of mortgage money.

In addition to the resources which I have mentioned, the President has proposed further plans for the cooperation of private capital with the Federal Government to make available a large sum of money to home owners of sound credit reputation, particularly for repair and modernization purposes.

The demand by home owners for loans with which to undertake improvements in their properties is increasing steadily. These people realize that a stitch in time saves nine. They know that every dollar they spend today for such repairs will save them many dollars later on. The longer such upkeep expenditure as reroofing, repainting, and other necessary maintenance of that kind is postponed, the more damage will be done by wear and tear, and the higher the cost of repairs would be.

Mortgage money for these worth-while undertakings is ready to be borrowed. The first step is to get in touch with some well-managed, private home-financing institution, such as a building-and-loan association, savings bank, or insurance company representative in your vicinity, and discuss your repair or building plans and your mortgage requirements fully.

The greatest need, and probably the greatest opportunity for accelerating our progress in the United States today is to have better homes at reasonable cost. To some extent, this means building new homes. To a much wider degree it means the modernization of good homes that have been built in the past. Millions of people in this country, of large and small incomes, are living in houses which could be made far more comfortable and more attractive with only a small outlay of money.

Let me assure you that the Federal Government is bending every effort to help American home owners in that direction. The time is coming when more people will insist upon taking just as much pride in their homes as they do now in their motor cars. They will insist upon good architecture, sound construction, and proper community planning as the necessary steps toward better and more permanent value and lower cost. Every citizen should give his self-interested cooperation to these vital changes which are now taking place.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE COFFIN, OF IDAHO

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 9, 1934.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. THOMAS C. COFFIN, a Representative from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provision of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I send to the desk resolutions which I ask to have read and immediately considered.

The resolutions (S.Res. 265) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. THOMAS C. COFFIN, late a Representative from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Under the second resolution, the Vice President appointed Mr. BORAH and Mr. POPE the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 12, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JUNE 11, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Bishop of our Souls and Shepherd Divine, Thou of the crozier and the cross, let us start this day with gladness and hope of heart. We pray that every today and every tomorrow may bring us closer to the truth of the Ancient of Days. Heavenly Father, for the sake of the good that now is, help us to pass to the better that is to be. Guard our Nation against causes of failure, for quite unconsciously do people lose the great qualities of soul. Almighty God, hold rich man and poor man, statesman and private citizen to the sense of self-control. With heart and brain, may they give themselves to sacrificial, unselfish devotion to those institutions that have made the Republic the friend of all men. Most graciously be with our President these hours and days; crown him with strength and wisdom; and may the pilot wheel of Government ever turn with liberty and justice for all, and may our flag be kept floating toward the morning sun and the evening sunset. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 9, 1934, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 9184. An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to sell the old Tenley School to the duly authorized representative of St. Ann's Church of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2156. An act for the relief of the American-La France Foamite Corporation of New York;

S. 3532. An act granting certain property to the State of Wisconsin for institutional purposes;

S. 3553. An act to provide for the creation of a commission to examine into and report the clear height above the water of the bridge authorized to be constructed over the Hudson River from Fifty-seventh Street, New York, to New Jersey; and

S. 3739. An act authorizing the President to convey certain buildings, material, and equipment to the Government of the Republic of Haiti.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 9002. An act to provide relief to Government contractors whose costs of performance were increased as a result of compliance with the act approved June 16, 1933, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8781) entitled "An act to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and to amend the Federal Road Act, approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes."

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LEMKE-FRAZIER BILL

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. When a motion to discharge a committee has been on the calendar for more than 7 days, is it not in order that that should be called up at this time?

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any such motion?

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I filed a motion to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from further consideration of what is known as the "Lemke-Frazier farm bill." That motion was placed on the Discharge Calendar the 2d day of June, and it has been on there now for 9 days. The rule provides that any Member who signed the motion to discharge, after the motion has been on the calendar at least 7 days, shall be recognized for the purpose of calling up the motion, and I rise at this time for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that 7 legislative days have not intervened.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, the rule does not say "7 legislative days." It merely says "7 days."

The SPEAKER. The calendar days June 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 are 1 legislative day.

Mr. SWANK. Is it the ruling of the Speaker that the motion must be on the calendar for 7 legislative days?

The SPEAKER. That is the ruling.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the point of order. Paragraph 4, rule 27, provides in part:

A Member may present to the Clerk a motion in writing to discharge a committee from the consideration of a public bill or resolution which has been referred to it 30 days prior thereto.

This motion was signed by 145 Members of the House, and was recorded in the Journal and in the RECORD on June 2. Further under this rule I read, as follows:

On the second and fourth Mondays of each month, except during the last 6 days of any session of Congress, immediately after the approval of the Journal, any Member who has signed a motion to discharge which has been on the calendar at least 7 days prior thereto, and seeks recognition, shall be recognized for the purpose of calling up the motion.

That is the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK] to call up the Frazier-Lemke bill. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that a short time ago a rule was adopted by this House giving to the floor leader the right to move to recess the House, which, as I am advised, was exercised on four different occasions since this motion was filed. In other words, under the rule that was adopted giving to the leader the right to make that motion, he exercised it, and a recess was granted under the terms of the motion, instead of the ordinary adjournment. The rule under which this motion is called up, if the Speaker will please note, was adopted by the House in December of 1931. I emphasize again the reading of the rule because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has raised the point that 7 legislative days have not intervened. If this rule had intended to say legislative days in 1931 it would have said legislative days, but the rule says in plain English:

Any Member who has signed a motion to discharge which has been on the calendar at least 7 days.

I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee, when he made the motion to recess, had in his mind, and that those who voted for it had in their minds, the defeat of this rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I doubt the propriety of that sort of argument on a point of order. The gentleman is making a political argument.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the gentleman has referred specifically to me I hope he will yield to me to say that he is wholly mistaken. The question of defeating this rule was not of primary importance, whatever the effect of the recess may have been. I may say to the gentleman and I would not be entirely frank if I did not say that I was opposed to the McLeod bill, if that is what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. DOWELL. The question is on the Lemke bill.

Mr. BYRNS. But my main object was to carry Monday over in order that the Unanimous Consent Calendar might be considered, and it was necessary to carry it until Thursday until we could consider it. And to prevent a recurrence of what occurred here several days ago, when 2½ hours were consumed in reading the Journal.

Mr. DOWELL. However that may be, and I accept the gentleman's explanation, the effect was to have 3 or 4 legislative days intervene in the meantime.

May I say further, Mr. Speaker, that the rule adopted in 1931 makes no reference to a legislative day. It refers to the fact that a motion must be on file 7 days at least, and then it may be called up by anyone signing the discharge motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I cannot yield just now. The whole purpose of this rule is to bring this Lemke bill to a vote immediately in the House. This House has been in session every day since the 2d day of June, when this motion took effect by the signatures of 145 Members of the House. My position is that after this rule has been signed by 145 Members of the House, after a lapse of 7 days, they are entitled to vote on this bill on the second or fourth Monday of the session. Now, it has been held that Sunday is not a legislative day, but there is no ruling, as far as I have been able to find, where the defeat of a plain rule can be had by recessing the House to the next day instead of adjournment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this could be accomplished by this method of procedure and if this rule is to be defeated by reason of the fact that a recess was had from one day to the other, then it seems to me the rule is to be set aside from time to time and cannot be put into execution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to hear me for a moment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, Mr. Speaker, let us get the parliamentary situation straight. I understand this question is submitted upon a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. And I made a point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I recall, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] submitted a parliamentary inquiry. Thereupon the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK] submitted an additional parliamentary inquiry; so that the matter is now pending before the Chair.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask to be heard a moment under reservation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no Member of this House, versed in parliamentary procedure, who would claim that a Sunday or a holiday could be counted in these necessary 7 days that must intervene.

Mr. DOWELL. That has already been held.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not yield, Mr. Speaker. It was held by Mr. Speaker Longworth that no Sunday or holiday could be counted as one of the necessary 7 days, as they must be legislative working days of the House.

For every legislative working day of this House the Journal must be read. There was no Journal read on these 4 calendar days, because the House was in recess. For every regular legislative working day of this House it must be opened by the Chaplain with a prayer. There was no opening of this House for these 4 days by a prayer of the Chaplain. Every single Member of this House had the right to vote against the rule that permitted the majority leader to move to take a recess, and if they had not been in favor of such rule, discharge rules, they could have defeated it by getting one more than one-third of the Members voting to vote against it, for it required a two-thirds majority, and on every discharge rule it takes a majority vote of this House to bring it up. I think the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL], is not well taken, and that my point of order should be sustained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry, for the purpose of clearing up the situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. I understand the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK] asked for recognition to move to discharge a committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. BOILEAU. And that is the matter before the House.

Mr. DOWELL. And a point of order was made against that by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. That is the situation. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. Speaker Longworth, in construing the Consent Calendar rule which provided that on the first and third Mondays of each month, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the Speaker should direct the Clerk to call bills which had been 3 days upon the Consent Calendar, held—

In order to be called on the Consent Calendar bills must be on the printed calendar three legislative working days.

The Chair thinks that the decision made by Speaker Longworth is applicable in the instant case and holds that the motion to discharge which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK] desires to call up, has not been on the Calendar 7 legislative working days, and therefore cannot now be called up.

TO AMEND THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act is amended—

"(1) By striking out 'July 1, 1934' wherever it appears in subsections (e), (l), and (y), and inserting in lieu thereof 'July 1, 1935';

"(2) By striking out 'June 15, 1934' where it appears in the last sentence of the third paragraph of subsection (y) and inserting in lieu thereof 'October 1, 1934';

"(3) By striking out 'June 30, 1934' where it appears in the first sentence of the fifth paragraph of subsection (y) and inserting in lieu thereof 'June 30, 1935';

"(4) By amending the second sentence of the fifth paragraph of subsection (y) to comprise two sentences reading as follows: 'The provisions of such subsection (l) relating to State member banks shall be extended for the purposes of this subsection to members of the fund which are not members of the Federal Reserve System, and the provisions of such subsection (l) relating to the appointment of the Corporation as receiver shall be applicable to all members of the fund. The provisions of this subsection shall apply only to deposits of members of the fund which have been made available since March 10, 1933, for withdrawal in the usual course of the banking business.';

"(5) By adding to the sixth paragraph of subsection (y) the following: 'The Corporation shall prescribe by regulations the manner of exercise of the right of nonmember banks to withdraw from membership in the fund on July 1, 1934, except that no bank shall be permitted to withdraw unless 10 days prior thereto it has given written notice to the Corporation of its election so to do. Banks which withdraw from the fund on July 1, 1934, shall be entitled to a refund of their proportionate share of any estimated balance in the fund on the same basis as if the fund had terminated on July 1, 1934.';

"(6) By adding to the end of the fourth paragraph of subsection (y) the following new paragraphs:

"'On and after July 1, 1934, the amount eligible for insurance under this subsection for the purposes of the October 1, 1934 certified statement, any entrance assessment, and, if levied, the additional assessment, shall be the amounts not in excess of $5,000 of the deposits of each depositor.

"'Each mutual savings bank, unless it becomes subject to the provisions of the preceding paragraph in the manner hereinafter provided, shall be excepted from the operation of the preceding paragraph and for each such bank which is so excepted the amount eligible for insurance under this subsection for the purposes of the October 1, 1934, certified statement, any entrance assessment, and, if levied, the additional assessment, shall be the amounts not in excess of $2,500 for the deposits of each depositor. In the event any mutual savings bank shall be closed on account of inability to meet its deposit liabilities the Corporation shall pay not more than $2,500 on account of the net approved claim of any owner of deposits in such bank: Provided, however, That should any mutual savings bank make manifest to the Corporation its election to be subject to the provisions of the preceding paragraph the Corporation may, in the discretion of the board of directors, permit such bank to become so subject and the insurance of its deposits to continue on the same basis and to the same extent as that of fund members other than mutual savings banks.

"'The Corporation, in the discretion of the board of directors, may open on its books solely for the benefit of mutual savings banks an additional Temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund (hereinafter referred to as the "Fund for Mutuals") which, if opened, shall become operative on or after July 1, 1934, but prior to August 1, 1934, and shall continue to July 1, 1935. If the Fund for Mutuals is opened on the books of the Corporation, each mutual savings bank which is or becomes entitled to the benefits of insurance during the period of its operation shall be a member thereof and shall not be a fund member. All assessments on each mutual savings bank, including payments heretofore made to the Corporation less an equitable deduction for liabilities and expenses of the fund incurred prior to the opening of the Fund for Mutuals, if opened, shall be transferred or paid, as the case may be, to the Fund for Mutuals. All provisions of this section applicable to the fund and not inconsistent with this paragraph shall be applicable to the Fund for Mutuals if opened, except that as to any period the two are in operation, the fund shall not be subject to the liabilities of the Fund for Mutuals and the Fund for Mutuals shall not be subject to the liabilities of the fund. Each mutual savings bank admitted to the fund shall bear its equitable share of the liabilities of the fund for the period it is a member thereof, including expenses of operation and allowing for anticipated recovery';

"(7) By striking out the period at the end of the first sentence of the fifth paragraph of subsection (y) and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: 'if the member closed on or before June 30, 1934, and not more than $5,000 if closed on or after July 1, 1934.';

"(8) By (a) striking out 'July 1, 1936' in the first sentence of subsection (l) and inserting in lieu thereof 'July 1, 1937', (b) striking out the words 'July 1, 1936' in the seventh paragraph of subsection (y) and inserting in lieu thereof 'July 1, 1937', and (c) adding after the seventh paragraph of subsection (y) the following new paragraph:

"'Until July 1, 1937, any State bank may obtain the benefits of this section on and after the date the fund is terminated upon the conditions with regard to examination, certification, and approval governing the admission of State banks to the fund and upon purchasing such class A stock or making such a deposit as is prescribed in the preceding paragraph for former fund members.'

"(9) By adding at the end of the first paragraph of subsection (v) the following new paragraph:

"'Every insured bank shall display at each place of business maintained by it a sign or signs to the effect that its deposits are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The Corporation shall prescribe by regulation the form of such sign and the manner of its display. Such regulation may impose a maximum penalty of $100 for each day an insured bank continues to violate any lawful provisions of said regulation.'; and

"(10) By amending the first sentence of the second paragraph of subsection (y) by inserting within the parentheses and immediately after the words 'District of Columbia' the words 'and the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska'.

"SEC. 2. The first paragraph of section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 321), is amended by adding after the second sentence thereof a new sentence to read as follows: 'For the purposes of membership of any such bank the terms "capital" and "capital stock" shall include the amount of outstanding capital notes and debentures legally issued by the applying bank and purchased by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.'

"SEC. 3. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended by adding before section 6 thereof the following new section:

"'SEC. 5e. (a) The Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans upon or purchase the assets of any bank, savings bank, or trust company, which has been closed on or after December 31, 1929, and prior to January 1, 1934, and the affairs of which have not been fully liquidated or wound up, upon such terms and conditions as the Corporation may by regulations prescribe. If in connection with the reorganization, stabilization, or liquidation of any such bank, assets have been trusteed or are otherwise held for the benefit of depositors or depositors and others, the authority, subject to regulations, as provided in the preceding sentence shall be extended for the purpose of authorizing the Corporation to purchase or make loans on such assets held for the benefit of such depositors or depositors and others. This authority shall also extend to any such institution that has reopened without payment of deposits in full. In making any purchase of or loan on the assets of any closed bank, the Corporation shall appraise such assets in anticipation of an orderly liquidation over a period of years, rather than on the basis of forced selling values in a period of business depression. This authority shall also extend to assets of the character made eligible by this section as security for loans without regard to whether the Corporation has heretofore made loans thereon.

"'(b) The Corporation shall purchase at par value such debentures or other obligations of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as are authorized to be issued under subsection (o) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, upon request of the board of directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, whenever in the judgment of said board additional funds are required for insurance purposes: Provided, That the Corporation shall not purchase or hold at any time said debentures or other obligation in excess of $250,000,000 par value: Provided further, That the proceeds derived from the purchase by the Corporation of any such debentures or other such obligations shall be used by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation solely in carrying out its functions with respect to such insurance.

"'(c) The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by $250,000,000.'

"SEC. 4. So much of section 31 of the Banking Act of 1933 as relates to stock ownership by directors, trustees, or members of similar governing bodies of member banks of the Federal Reserve System, is hereby repealed."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment strikes out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause. The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, with an amendment which is a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House amendment. The differences between the House amendment and the substitute agreed upon by the conferees are noted in the following outline, except for incidental changes made necessary by reason of the agreement reached by the conferees, and minor and clarifying changes.

The House amendment (sec. 1 (5)) added a new sentence to the sixth paragraph of subsection (y) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, giving to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation the power to prescribe by regulations the manner of exercise of the right of nonmember banks to withdraw from membership in the Temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund on July 1, 1934, but provided specifically that no bank should be permitted to withdraw unless 20 days' notice of such withdrawal prior to such date was given by the bank to each of its depositors and to the Corporation. The substitute (sec. 1 (5)) adopts the provision of the House amendment, except that the requirement of 20 days is reduced to 10 days, owing to the nearness of the date for withdrawal, and eliminates the requirement of written notice to each of the depositors of the bank, due to the obvious difficulty which large savings banks would meet in complying with such requirement. In this connection it should be noted that the substitute (sec. 1 (9)) retains the provision for the protection of depositors contained in the House amendment, which requires members of the fund to display at their places of business a sign or signs to the effect that their deposits are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The House amendment (sec. 1 (6)) contained a provision placing mutual savings banks in a separate category as to insurance under the temporary plan, their deposits to be insured only to the extent of $2,500, unless they make definite application to the Corporation to continue on the same basis and to the same extent as other fund members. The substitute (sec. 1 (6)) retains this provision, but amplifies the underlying principle thereof by conferring upon the Corporation discretionary power to open on its books an additional temporary fund, to be known as the "Fund for Mutuals", of which, if opened, all mutual savings banks which are or become entitled to the benefits of insurance shall be members. If opened, the Fund for Mutuals is to become operative on or after July 1, 1934, but before August 1, 1934, and is to continue until July 1, 1935; and during its operation no mutual savings bank is to be a fund member.

The House amendment (sec. 1 (8)) amended subsection (l), and the seventh paragraph of subsection (y), of section 12B by removing therefrom the limitation—July 1, 1936—as to the insurance of deposits in State banks not members of the Federal Reserve System, and added a new paragraph to subsection (y) expressly permitting such nonmember banks to obtain the benefits of insurance after the temporary fund is terminated "upon the conditions with regard to examination, certification, and approval governing the admission of State banks to the fund and upon purchasing such class A stock or making such deposit as is prescribed" for former fund members. The substitute (sec. 1 (8)) modifies these provisions of the House amendment so as to postpone the termination of insurance of such nonmember banks until July 1, 1937, and to permit nonmember banks to obtain the benefits of the permanent insurance after the fund is terminated—July 1, 1935—until July 1, 1937.

The House amendment (sec. 1 (9) and (10)) provided for an increase in the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized to have outstanding under subsection (o) of section 12B from three times the amount of its capital to five times the amounts of its "subscribed capital"; and further provided for the guarantee by the United States of the principal interest of such of the obligations of the Corporation as the Corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, might determine. The substitute eliminates these provisions, but includes (sec. 3 (b)) a direction to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase the obligations of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, upon request of the board of directors of insurance corporation whenever the latter is in need of additional funds for insurance purposes, to the extent of $250,000,000; and it is also provided that the proceeds from such purchase shall be used by the insurance corporation solely for insurance purposes. The borrowing power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under existing law is increased (sec. 3 (c)) by $250,000,000.

The House amendment (sec. 4 (a)) conferred upon the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation the power to make loans upon or purchase the assets of any bank, savings bank, or trust company which was closed on or after December 31, 1929, and prior to January 1, 1934, and the affairs of which have not been fully liquidated or wound up, the appraisal of assets for such purposes to be made "in anticipation of an orderly liquidation over a period of years rather than on the basis of forced selling values in a period of business depression." The substitute (sec. 3 (a)) places this power in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (retaining, however, the same standards for the exercise thereof as are contained in the House amendment).

The House amendment (sec. 4 (b)) amended subsection (1) of section 12B with respect to the division, as between the depositors of the bank and the Corporation, of the amounts realized upon the liquidation by the Corporation of the assets of an insured bank which has been closed. This amendment would change the existing law which provides that the Corporation shall take all such dividends until it has reimbursed itself to the full amount of the insured liability of each depositor and shall then pay any further dividends to each depositor on the basis of the bank's deposit liability to him, so as to provide that in case the amount of the bank's deposit liability to any depositor exceeds the amount of the insured deposit liability, the Corporation and the depositor "shall share ratably in the dividends insofar as the same are based upon deposit liability to such depositor according to the ratio that the insured liability to such depositor bears to the total amount of the net approved claim of such depositor." The substitute eliminates this provision.

HENRY B. STEAGALL,
T. ALAN GOLDSBOROUGH,
ROBERT LUCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill provided for the extension of the provisions of the Banking Act of 1933, establishing a plan for the temporary insurance of bank deposits, from January 1, 1934, to the 1st day of July 1934, so that the temporary plan would be operative until the 1st of July 1935, and postponing the effectiveness of the permanent plan for insurance of bank deposits until the 1st of July 1935.

The original amount of insurance provided under the temporary plan covers $2,500 for each individual deposit. That provision was continued by the Senate bill. Under the House bill the temporary insurance was raised to the amount of $5,000 for each depositor. There has also been incorporated in the report a provision of the House bill which will permit mutual savings banks to remain in the insurance corporation under the plan which insures each individual depositor up to the amount of $2,500, or, upon the application of such banks, to increase the insurance up to $5,000 for each individual depositor.

In addition to that there is a provision which would authorize the Deposit Insurance Corporation to set up a separate fund for the insurance of deposits in mutual savings banks which would place these institutions in a category separate from other insured institutions.

The House bill embodied a provision which authorized the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to expand its capital five times by issuing its obligations to be guaranteed by the Treasury. The present law authorizes the Deposit Insurance Corporation to expand its obligations three times, and this provision is retained.

The measure as reported authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans upon and to purchase the assets of closed banks. This provision is identical in substance with the provision incorporated in the House bill which contemplated relief for depositors in closed banks by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. There was in the House bill a provision which eliminated the requirements in the Banking Act of 1933 that all nonmember banks could be insured only down to the 1st of July 1936 without joining the Federal Reserve System. The conferees extended for the period of 1 year the time within which nonmember banks may be insured without joining the Federal Reserve System. So this privilege runs until the 1st of July 1937.

The House conferees return with a report which adopts substantially everything embodied in the House bill except a slight compromise, as I have indicated, with reference to the right of nonmember banks to be insured without joining the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the conference report contain any statement with reference to the capital-stock holdings of directors of banks?

Mr. STEAGALL. I thank the gentleman for mentioning this matter. It was one of the main thoughts I had in mind in taking any time in connection with this report.

There is a wide-spread interest throughout the country in a provision of the Banking Act of 1933 which changed the law respecting the requirements for stock ownership by directors of national banks. There is on the Speaker's desk a bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency which amends the Banking Act of 1933 so as to restore the original law that existed prior to the act of 1933. To save the time of the House we did not call up this bill under suspension but incorporated its provisions in the present bill, the report on which is now before the House. So under the bill now before us we will go back to the old law in existence prior to the act of 1933. Under that law directors in national banks will be required to own, each director in his own right, capital stock of his institution to the par value of $1,000.

I make this statement because banks throughout the country are greatly interested, especially the small banks, on account of difficulties encountered in meeting the requirements of the Banking Act of 1933 in that regard.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. MAY. What did the conferees agree upon as to the size of any individual deposit to be guaranteed?

Mr. STEAGALL. The amount of temporary insurance is raised from $2,500 as provided in the Banking Act of 1933 and as provided in the Senate bill to $5,000 as provided in the House bill. This represents a substantial forward step in the insurance of bank deposits. I may say to the gentleman, as I said when the bill was under consideration in the House, that it is agreed on all sides, and we have assurance from the members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate and from the administration, that there will be no backward step in this great reform for the insurance of bank deposits and that no move for its repeal will be tolerated.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. This will repeal part of section 31 of the act of 1933?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is correct.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. On page 9, subsection (c), it is sought to amend section 31. That is the section that refers to the change in the law with reference to the requirement of ownership of stock?

Mr. STEAGALL. I have explained that under the bill now before us we return to the requirements of the law in existence prior to the Banking Act of 1933.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That was $1,000?

Mr. STEAGALL. That was $1,000 stock par value, to be owned by each director.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. In regard to the amendment to section 3 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, I notice authority there in section 5 (L) to loan to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation $250,000,000 on their debentures. I had supposed that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was organized to keep the United States Government out of this question of guaranty of bank deposits. This amendment permits the use of Treasury funds through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the extent of $250,000,000. This involves the United States Government still further in guaranty of bank deposits.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is correct.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is not an independent institution?

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that the Deposit Insurance Corporation has now $290,000,000 of capital. It has approximately $40,000,000 representing an assessment against banks participating in the Corporation and based upon the amount of deposits insured, the assessment being one-fourth of 1 percent, and the Corporation is authorized to assess as much as 1 percent against all deposits insured. The enlargement of the insurance of each individual depositor to $5,000 will add something like $5,000,000 perhaps to the insurance fund, which would authorize an additional assessment. This means that the Corporation may raise, in addition to its capital stock under the temporary plan, another $150,000,000 as a minimum estimate; so that the Corporation will have about $450,000,000 of initial funds.

The Corporation is permitted to expand three times under the original law, which is to be retained; but it was thought desirable to have access to the facilities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the reason that it was not deemed desirable to have the Deposit Insurance Corporation undertake to sell its debentures in opposition to obligations of similar Government agencies that are guaranteed by the Treasury. It is not thought that there is the slightest possibility of any requirement of a loan or the purchase of assets of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This is simply a safeguard to assure the country and the public that the Deposit Insurance Corporation has ample funds with which to do the work of insuring deposits. Under the law, the Deposit Insurance Corporation will have potential resources of approximately one and one-half billion dollars.

During the 6 months that have passed, the Deposit Insurance Corporation has not been called upon to pay one dollar to any depositor of any bank in the United States belonging to the Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Deposit Insurance Corporation is operating at a profit of $1,000,000 a month.

Mr. McFADDEN. If I understand the gentleman correctly, the expansion beyond the capital of the Federal Deposit Insurance Co. which has already been provided is three times its capital, plus the right to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation $250,000,000 more?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is required to purchase assets to that amount upon request of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is the extent of their liability?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I had understood, as other Members, that when the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was incorporated with this capital which was contributed by the member banks of the Federal Reserve System and through the allocation of the surplus of the Federal Reserve System plus a further contribution from the Government that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation would stand on its own foundation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Here we find an authorization to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which is simply the back door of the Treasury, to loan $250,000,000, so that this involves the Government in the insurance of bank deposits. May I ask the gentleman whether this is Federal insurance or not?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman understands, I am sure, that under the permanent plan for the insurance of deposits the set-up for the raising of capital is continued as it is under the temporary plan, with additional capital in the form of subscriptions by the banks, amounting to one-half of 1 percent based on their total deposits.

Under the permanent plan the Deposit Insurance Corporation is authorized, whenever their funds amount to less than one-fourth of 1 percent of all deposits of participating banks, to levy an additional charge of one-fourth of 1 percent against the participating banks. The permanent provisions of the bill place the obligation and the burden, with the exception of the initial capital, upon the participating banks of the country. The extension of the temporary plan for a period of 1 year made it desirable, and we thought prudent to incorporate in the provisions a plan which would safeguard the corporation in the matter of available funds sufficient to meet any possible anticipated contingency, and for this reason we have given the corporation may borrow $250,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation——

Mr. McFADDEN. I think it should be made perfectly clear that in order that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation may borrow $250,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation——

Mr. STEAGALL. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to purchase debentures of the Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Mr. McFADDEN. We are increasing the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to borrow on its debentures from the United States Treasury by $250,000,000 more.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. It is rather unusual for the Government to furnish the initial capital and then allow the company getting the money to expand it from 3 to 5 times. In this particular case the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, under existing law, can expand 3 times, and I notice this conference report extends that to 5 times the amount of the subscribed stock, which may be as much as 10 or 15 times the actual paid-in capital stock. Is it not a fact that this impresses the Corporation with the title of an investment trust more than anything else?

Mr. STEAGALL. Of course, the purpose of permitting a liberal expansion of the capital of the corporation is to assure the public, whose confidence we are attempting to restore in the banks of the Nation, that the Corporation has ample funds available and sufficient to meet its responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ROSEMONDE E. LAFFERTY

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 425

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Rosemonde E. Lafferty, widow of George Carter

Lafferty, late an official reporter of debates of the House of Representatives, an amount equal to 6 months' compensation and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray funeral expenses of the said George Carter Lafferty.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF SUBVERSIVE PROPAGANDA ACTIVITIES

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer another privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 424

Resolved, That the special committee created by House Resolution 198, Seventy-third Congress, second session, to investigate Nazi propaganda activities and certain other subversive propaganda and other matters in relation thereto is hereby authorized to expend not exceeding the sum of $40,000 in addition to the amount authorized to be expended by House Resolution 199, Seventy-third Congress, second session, such additional amount to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by the committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 6, strike out "$40,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$20,000"; and at the end of the resolution add the following: "That the official committee reporters shall be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia."

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does this resolution mean we are raising the appropriation for the Nazi investigation from $25,000 to $40,000?

Mr. WARREN. I may state to the gentleman that the House has already appropriated $10,000 and they have asked for an additional $40,000. The committee now comes in with an amendment to make it $20,000.

Mr. O'MALLEY. In other words, the total amount of money the committee will have will be $30,000?

Mr. WARREN. If the committee is sustained here this morning; yes.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I find it rather difficult to take issue with my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], and I find it a little difficult to advance to the House the necessity of the special committee recommendation being adopted, in view of the statement which was originally made to the Committee on Accounts that the maximum amount would probably not exceed $25,000.

However, as chairman of the special committee, I introduced the resolution asking for $40,000 additional because I felt that was the minimum amount that was reasonably necessary in order to carry out the investigation which the House has ordered.

It must be borne in mind that I have no personal feeling, and will have no personal reaction on whatever action the House may take, whether it gives $20,000 or $40,000. If the House should determine that $5,000 was all that was necessary, I would carry on on that basis. If the House should determine that $20,000 or $40,000 in addition should be given, I will carry on the work as chairman of the committee that has been assigned to me.

At the time the statements were made to the Committee on Accounts by those who made them, it was never thought or conceived that the investigation would go to the extent it has gone. When I was appointed chairman of the committee, I never thought that the evidence which has been disclosed ever existed in the United States. I never thought that there would be anything discovered outside of individual activity, and that the activities engaged in were more or less confined to individuals in this country. I never thought that we would make a contact with a foreign government, or a political party in control of a foreign government, sending instructions into the United States to persons in the United States, a few citizens and most of them aliens, to engage in activities within our borders for the purpose of arraying Americans against Americans because of their race. I consider the attempt to array Americans against Americans because of racial or religious differences subversive to our Government and our people.

When I was appointed chairman I reached the conclusion that there would be no speech-making before the committee.

The committee has received information from many sources of the activities of certain persons, but at the outset we determined, and properly so, that there be a complete investigation made by the committee itself in order to ascertain the facts. The committee also determined to try to obtain evidence as to the origin of any subversive efforts in this country and to be sure that the evidence and the reputed facts were reasonably certain before summoning any witness to a public hearing.

It is immaterial to me who may be involved by the facts that might be developed—if it is evidence and not mere opinion of some person it will be brought out into the public for the benefit of the American people, and for the use and benefit of the Congress for its future action.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The controversy now pending before the House seems to be whether or not the gentleman's committee will need $40,000 to complete this investigation, and whether or not the amount recommended by the Committee on Accounts will be sufficient. I am sure the House would like to hear from the gentleman some of the details as to the nature of his investigation and why this money is necessary.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am coming to that, but I was laying the foundation so that the House might understand some of the considerations of the committee. I also asked the other members of the committee to refrain from making public statements.

It is not conducive to the best interests of this committee and the House which appointed it to have members of the committee weighing the evidence, making statements indicating they were prejudging the facts, whatever they may be, if and when disclosed to or produced by the committee. Our purpose is to try to get the facts, not to listen to statements—not to listen to opinions, not to let people, no matter how earnestly they might entertain their views, appear before the committee and assail or make accusation against this or that person—not to bring people before the committee who might be only slightly involved, but to try to get underneath the surface, to get the facts as to the origin, if they existed, and if they did not exist to disclose that faot to the American public and so report to the House of Representatives. Having that in mind, to obtain evidence—not to listen to statements of opinion unsupported by evidence, even if such views were honestly entertained—we had to employ investigators. Those men are on the pay roll and are not receiving what the Government pays its investigators. We had to employ our counsel. We wanted a reputable man, a man who commanded the respect of all of the people of the United States, because naturally there are some racial groups of Americans who might feel, in their minds, that this investigation was directed toward them. As a matter of fact, there is no such state of mind existing on the part of any Member of the House. Naturally, the great element of Americans of German descent, that great class of citizens who comprise such an important part of our citizenry, might feel that this investigation is directed toward them; but, as a matter of fact, there is no justification for such a thought existing in their minds. It is only natural, however, that they might feel that way unless the committee, by its investigations and its own actions, convince them that it was confining itself, so far as the Nazi activity is concerned, to the source of the activities in this country emanating from abroad.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. Who was instrumental in bringing about this investigation?

Mr. McCORMACK. The House of Representatives voted the resolution.

Mr. DUNN. But who was the one who introduced it?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not going to yield for that question. The gentleman has his own opinion the same as I have mine.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I might say that the German people, the ones that I have any contact with, are very resentful of this investigation, no matter what the gentleman and his committee might say.

Mr. McCORMACK. There is no justification for any real American of any blood resenting any investigation to obtain facts for the American people, and to obtain facts of subversive movements within our country emanating from abroad, and the gentleman ought to be ashamed of himself, as a Member of the House of Representatives, in undertaking to rise in this House and speak for the countless millions of Americans of German blood. I challenge the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska rose.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is all. I do not yield any more.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I do not give a damn what you say. The investigation will do nothing except to create and inflame racial prejudice and, in my judgment, is pure political propaganda.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman does not interest me at all, and that is not the language to use in the House of Representatives, and not the language of a gentleman.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. If the gentleman from Massachusetts were a gentleman, he would yield to me. By his own actions he indicates that he is in the same category to which he assigns me.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, to illustrate, 2 weeks ago we had an executive session in New York for the purpose of finding out whether certain information we obtained was correct, so that witnesses might not be called to a public hearing unless the evidence justified it, so as not to call people to public hearings because somebody said this or that, but to make a complete investigation. An attorney of German blood, a fine American and gentleman, and I had a few words, nothing serious or personal. That gentleman was at the public hearings the other day, the three public hearings we have held in Washington, and on the second day he came up to me and congratulated the committee upon its fairness and issued a public statement that this committee was eminently fair in its investigation; yet 10 days ago he questioned the motives of the committee. Afterward at the public hearings he made a public statement to the press, as I said, that the committee was conducting itself in an eminently fair and sincere manner.

I do not think there is any American in this country who loves our country, who still has a love for the land of his forbears, as he should, who stands for any movement or any efforts within this country by any foreign agencies, which efforts or movements might reasonably be subversive of our Government or our people. I cannot believe that any Americans of any racial descent entertain such thoughs. If so, they are not Americans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sorry as I have only a few minutes left, and I want to come to the question presented by my distinguished friend from Alabama.

We selected as our counsel a former United States Senator, a former Governor of Georgia, a great American. His career shows his tolerance by his votes and his actions. I refer to Thomas W. Hardwick, a great American and a fine gentleman. He would see that any investigation is fair. He will protect the constitutional rights of any witness. He is guiding us. He is consulting with us. Every member of the committee joins with him in his desire to have an investigation which is eminently a fair American investigation to disclose facts for the benefit of our own people and of our Congress.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sorry, but I have only a minute left.

Now, what does it cost? We were allowed $10,000 and we have expended to date a little over $5,000. This investigation must go on during the summer months. We reasonably must spend about $4,100 or $4,200 on our investigators, our stenographers, our clerical force, and our counsel. We must continue during the summer. We want to investigate communistic activities, as to the source; not to listen to mere speeches or opinions, but to try to find out the source of the money, where the money comes from, the source of these activities in this country, if possible. We will also investigate other subversive organizations.

Already as the result of investigations the head of the Silver Shirts was indicted in North Carolina for violation of the State laws, and the evidence clearly discloses that the same man should be indicted for violation of Federal laws.

Seven months at $4,100 is about $28,000. That does not include witness fees. That does not include stenographic expenses outside of the District of Columbia. That does not include traveling expenses of the committee in executive or in public session.

When the committee holds public hearings, if they do, on the west coast, I, as chairman, will exercise whatever influence I have to not have the full committee go out there, but have the public hearings held by a subcommittee. And during the summer months, when hearings are held in the East, I do not want Members from the west coast coming East at the expense of the Government. A subcommittee can do it.

It is my firm conviction that we need $40,000. Otherwise we will be somewhat cramped. However, if you give us $20,000 or $10,000 or $5,000, or if you vote nothing, as chairman of the committee I will carry on the investigation until we have completely exhausted the funds which the House has given to us. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] has again expired.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, we have just heard a very fair and impassioned speech by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]. From the first time I ever knew the gentleman after he entered the House down to the present hour, he has been one of the dearest and closest friends I have ever had in this body. In my opinion, and I am certainly not passing the usual compliment, he is one of the very ablest men that has been in Congress for a long time, and he is a credit to his State, to his district, and to the Nation as an able legislator. He is the very soul of character, sincerity, and fineness. [Applause.]

The situation that I am now about to disclose, I absolve him of, because he knew nothing about it. He did not know at the time that certain assurances were given to the Committee on Accounts, that he would even be a member of this investigating committee. Now, the House passed the resolution authorizing the Nazi investigation, and, of course, it is up to the Committee on Accounts, and it is incumbent upon it, to furnish the funds to carry it on. After the passage of the resolution the sum of $25,000 was asked for. We heard the proponents for several hours or more. Guarding the contingent fund, as we try to do, we reported out and the House passed the sum of $10,000, and I am frank to say that we expected them to come back for more, but we wanted to know what their set-up was going to be and how they were going to use this money. I am sure that no member of the Committee on Accounts or, in fact, any Member of the House, ever had any idea that this would cost to exceed $25,000.

Now, this is what has happened, and I think it is more or less an ugly situation. This is public business, and the House and the country is entitled to know how public funds are being expended. This is why so much money is needed:

They have put on a counsel at the sum of $555.55 a month. I call your attention to the fact that in another body a great investigator, who many of us think has done a great job, Ferdinand Pecora, has only received throughout all of it the sum of $300 a month. They told us when they first came before us they would probably need two or three investigators. They have today got 13 investigators on the pay roll, with more to follow when additional money is granted.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. In just a moment.

Two investigators at the sum of $250 a month and expenses; 8 investigators at the sum of $225 a month and expenses; 2 investigators at $165 a month and expenses; 2 stenographers at $137.50 a month; 1 messenger at $20 a week.

Now, here is something else: At the hearing the other day they told us they would probably need one or more associate counsel, and I find that an associate counsel has already been placed on the rolls, retroactive to May 21, at a salary of $388.89 a month.

Here is something else: They have elected a secretary to this committee. They have selected a man who was carried on the rolls as janitor to the Committee on Immigration at $90 a month, and made him secretary to this investigation committee at $330 a month. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the true picture and the present situation. The House is entitled to this information. I may say that the entire membership of the Committee on Accounts was present at the meeting last week and we more or less reluctantly reported out the resolution for $20,000 additional to the $10,000 we have already given them, believing that they could complete this investigation with a total sum of $30,000 and wind up its work and stop.

In all of my experience in the House of Representatives this is the highest pay roll I have ever seen carried on by an investigation authorized by this body.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. When this resolution originally came up I opposed it as a useless waste of the taxpayers' money. I have never been able to figure out why, when an investigating committee needed a lot of investigators, they could not use investigators from the Department of Justice or the Secret Service, men who are already on the Government pay roll.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to be fair about this. This question has been asked before, and we have heard from Mr. Hoover, Chief of the Bureau of Investigation, on the subject. He has told us that they had neither the authority nor the men nor the money to conduct such investigations; and that is the fact.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Why could not the House in passing these resolutions authorize the Department of Justice investigators to make the investigations?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, did not Mr. Hoover make the additional statement that if his Department were to undertake this investigation it would take $100,000?

Mr. McCORMACK. He said that with $100,000, were they directed to make the investigation, they could hardly scratch the surface.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. It is quite apparent from the disclosures made by the gentleman from North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee on Accounts, that this investigating committee should wind up its hearings. I do not think a single Member of the House doubts or questions any statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina. It is apparent that this money has gone to favor friends rather than to help the citizens of this country when they take a janitor at $90 a month and make him secretary of the committee, raising his salary to $300 a month. I think that the House, instead of granting more funds to this committee, ought to abolish it. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. Another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the House is that in the legislative appropriation bill which passed the House a few weeks ago there was allotted for special investigations the sum of $49,500. For use between the 1st of July this year and the 1st of January next year there has already been assigned out of that allotment the sum of $44,000. This leaves us with $5,000 for several investigations that are coming along, some of them very proper ones. So it will be necessary that still further appropriations be made by both branches of Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman seriously question the judgment of the committee in the matter, outside of the clerk to which he particularly refers; does he question the judgment of the committee as to the necessity for the number of investigators, or does he question the judgment of the committee as to the reasonableness of the amount paid?

Mr. WARREN. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question; but I do say that the Committee on Accounts was positively assured that it would not require over two or three investigators; yet the gentleman now comes in here with 13, and more to follow.

Mr. McCORMACK. But the gentleman does not hold me responsible for what others said, I hope.

Mr. WARREN. I absolved the gentleman from Massachusetts and said that when that statement was made the gentleman from Massachusetts was not even a member of the investigating committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to enter into any dispute with my friend from North Carolina; I want the facts only. With reference to counsel for the committee, may I say that while I have the greatest respect for Mr. Pecora, frankly, does the gentleman believe he is in the same category with the former Governor and former Senator, Mr. Hardwick? I refer not to ability of these gentlemen, as Mr. Pecora is outstanding in this respect, as is Senator Hardwick, but to the difference in their ages, and that Senator Hardwick has long since made his reputation. The committee is very fortunate in obtaining the services of Senator Hardwick, and I consider his compensation fair and reasonable.

Mr. WARREN. I think that the salary of $555 a month is entirely out of line with the salaries paid attorneys just as prominent and just as distinguished as the former Senator from Georgia, for whom I have great respect.

Mr. McCORMACK. What would be the gentleman's opinion as to the amount the salary should be?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot go into that question with the gentleman; that is up to his committee. I am just laying before the House the bare facts in this matter. I cannot take too much of the time for I promised to yield time to others; but may I say that the committee has brought in this resolution with an amendment fixing the amount at $20,000. If you want this investigation wound up and closed up for $30,000 in all, then you should vote for the committee amendment and pass the resolution.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If we do not vote for the committee amendment, and if we do not pass the resolution, the committee will stop right where it is, will it not?

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the resolution must be passed by the House for the committee to continue.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I, a member of the committee, would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, of course, it cannot be denied that when a resolution of this kind is passed there must be some justification for it. If this were not so, an intelligent House of Representatives would not have authorized the investigation. But how much should be spent is another matter.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] has explained the situation so well and has set forth the details so completely that it is necessary for me to trespass but little upon the time of the House.

I proposed in the committee that an additional amount of $5,000 be appropriated in order to enable the committee to finish its work, and at the appropriate time I propose to offer an amendment to the pending resolution reducing the amount to $5,000. This will give the committee sufficient money with which to wind up its work.

An observation of 30 years in rather close contact with legislative affairs convinces me that very little ever comes out of a congressional investigation except caustic criticism and ironical comments against the Congress of the United States, and I am determined to prevent, so far as I am able, any further voluminous reports of investigations being added to the great number already gathering dust and taking up needed space in the basement of the Capitol.

I have read such testimony as has been taken and made available to me; I have followed very carefully the newspaper reports that have been published; and I am unable to find, Mr. Speaker, any indication that justifies further expenditure by the House in connection with this investigation.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. So that the facts may be brought out accurately and properly, I understand, relative to the comparison of the compensation paid to Mr. Ferdinand Pecora and ex-Governor Hardwick, that the members of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee are considering the matter of a very substantial bonus to be paid to Mr. Pecora.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not care what the lawyers are worth. There is no need for a lawyer in connection with this committee. There are, to my knowledge, five Members of the House of Representatives serving on the committee who are lawyers, and I see no reason why they should have to ask for advice from special counsel or from associate counsel.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. YOUNG. I think the gentleman is entirely correct in his statement; and in regard to the appropriation of an additional $5,000, would it not be better, in the gentleman's judgment, if we let the matter rest just as it is and limit the expenditure of this committee to the $10,000 previously appropriated?

Mr. McLEAN. That would be my wish and desire. But there must be some justification for this activity on the part of the House, otherwise the House would not have passed the resolution. It was the intention in the beginning, if this committee showed the House there was justification for the investigation and that it was going to accomplish anything commensurate with the amount of money spent, to give them additional funds. This has not been indicated up to this time, but there may be something which would justify a completion of the work and the committee has made commitments which the House must respect.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN. May I call the attention of the gentleman to a question which was propounded by myself at the time this bill was before us previously for consideration:

Mr. BUCHANAN. I notice in this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and conduct hearings anywhere in the United States. There is no limitation on the expense. I have discussed that shortly with the author of the resolution, and he assured me it would not cost over $25,000. Has the gentleman any objection to putting a limitation in the bill that it shall not exceed $25,000 expense?

Mr. COX. That is an important proposal. This investigation is important. I would think that a full and complete investigation might be had within the limitations of the expenditure of $25,000.

Let us hold him to it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, 2 years ago an attempt was made by certain members of the Immigration Committee to have an investigation made, and I opposed it on the floor of the House and was successful in my opposition. My opposition was in line with my usual position in opposing all junkets. This is another request emanating from that committee. While I was not at least in favor of it, I offered no opposition to it when it came up for consideration. Its purpose was to secure an allowance to carry on the work of what was to be known as a "committee to investigate un-American propaganda", including Nazi propaganda. The Republican floor leader appointed me to membership on this committee, and I am the ranking Republican member.

Speaking for the Republican membership, we want it distinctly understood that none of us have been before the Committee on Accounts asking anything in reference to this investigation. We have made no representation, and, so far as I know, none of us knew who would be on the committee or anything about the financial set-up for its operation. We have just gone along for a very distinguished member of the Democratic Party, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], has been selected as chairman of the committee. And as such chairman, it has been his responsibility to take the lead in all matters connected with the work. Personally, I have not been in attendance at the committee hearings but a very few times, and I know little of what has transpired in the hearings, but that will not absolve me in your mind, because you will hold that we should know something about these things. My only apology, if an apology is needed, is that I have too much to do. Most of you are in the same position.

May I tell you what the situation is? Here is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], asking for an additional amount of money, and from all indications he has done a good job. No one impugns his motives. He has stated his case, and he has made certain representations. What are you on the Democratic side going to do about the matter? The attorney which has been employed is a Democrat; his assistant is a Democrat, and every individual that has been employed in this investigation except one stenographer, has been put on by the Democratic membership.

Do you expect us on the Republican side to oppose this resolution for that reason? No! We may not be at least for these expensive investigations, but we do not want to make a partisan matter of it. Fun has been made of the janitor who was selected as a clerk or secretary. No one has risen in his defense. Mr. Randolph has been for years the secretary or clerk of the Immigration Committee. I do not know how he stands or how he is classified on the record with reference to the salary he receives, but I may say that he is a capable individual. In fact, he is one of the most efficient secretaries of any committee in this House, and so far as I know, he is a Democrat. I desire to rise in his defense. I do not want him to be referred to as a janitor or as an incompetent individual, because he is, on the other hand, a very fine, high-class individual.

What are you going to do about this investigation? Personally, I have never been in favor of it, but am I going to run out on the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] in connection with this matter? I do not know what it is going to lead to. As I said before, I was never much in favor of it. Here is what I believe in doing. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] comes before you and tells you he needs some money and makes a good case, we ought to give it to him. He is not going to insist on $40,000. I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] and his committee have struck a balance, and I believe we on this side will stand for $20,000, and that Mr. MCCORMACK will be satisfied with that amount.

We do not want to uphold extravagance. Of course, I do not think we need 12 investigators, and I would not have favored employing that many. I do not think we need an assistant counsel. If you will pass this resolution for $20,000, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] I am sure will see to it that the money is spent in the most economical way, and in a way that will bring forth the finest results.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I say in connection with the assistant counsel that this was a matter of urgency in connection with the public hearings. He was employed temporarily, and the man had to be paid. There was a question of the assembling of a large amount of evidence, as the gentleman knows. The chief counsel, Mr. Hardwick, could not devote all his time to that, so we appointed an assistant counsel for the very specific purpose of assimilating the evidence in proper form for the Members to understand before and after the actual public hearings.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. There is nothing in connection with this investigation that needs to be made a laughing stock. So far there is nothing that anyone needs be ashamed of. The issue is, do we want an investigation like this? Do you want it? You have voted for it. If you want to have it carried out you should stand by your chairman to the extent of helping him reasonably. If you did not want Mr. McCORMACK to make an investigation you should have said so in the beginning. As I have heretofore stated, I have not been outspoken in favor of any investigation that tends to deal with prejudices between groups. The question now is, What are you going to do? Are you going to take a perfectly respectable Member of this House and hold him up to ridicule? I say no. I believe we should give him the $20,000 and let him do the job in the very best way he can.

Mr. WARREN. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

I do not understand that anyone is trying to hold the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] up to ridicule or shame. There has been no such insinuation here. I stated in the very beginning of my remarks that when the matter was first presented to the Committee on Accounts, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] was not a member of the committee and had never been before us.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not mean to criticize him at all, but the impression has been created that this is a sort of junket or a sort of useless thing, and, as I have stated, this may be true, but we should have considered in the first instance whether or not this investigation should be made at all, and now, since it is being made, we should do the right thing about it. Instead of voting $40,000 addition let us vote $20,000, which will enable Mr. McCORMACK to continue, and to cut his expenses to suit the appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the members of the Committee on Accounts are servants of the House. The committee watches over and controls the contingent fund of the House from which expenses are paid to carry on investigations authorized by the House. Ever since I have been a member of the committee, some 8 years, I have found that the personnel of the committee consider the passage of a resolution providing for an investigation a mandate for the appropriation of expenses for the investigation. When the House does not name a specific sum it is our duty to try and decide how much money will be needed to reach the objective set out in the resolution. The resolution being debated was wide open. The committee is at liberty to enter any number of fields, and in my opinion it could prolong its investigation over a period of years if it so desired.

In this instance the original request called for an appropriation of $25,000, and when the author of the resolution came before the committee and presented his case the members thought $10,000 would be sufficient at the outset. Following the action of the committee, the Speaker named the personnel of the committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] is the chairman. That he has presided over the committee with dignity no one can question. That he is level-headed, anything but emotional, we all know. That he will continue to carry on as he has in the past every member of our committee is satisfied. Mr. McCORMACK appeared before the Committee on Accounts in support of the request for $40,000 additional. This is just double the amount the original resolution provided for. The committee reduced this one half, and the resolution is before you for your decision.

I for one feel if the investigation shows that it would be futile to continue, Mr. McCORMACK will so decide, and not spend the money. Contrary to the general opinion, this committee is not confining itself to the Nazi propaganda. It has entered other fields.

The House having ordered the investigation, it is for the House to determine if it should be continued. We, the members of the Committee on Accounts, are simply carrying out your mandate.

The House has confidence in the gentleman from Massachusetts. He has already shown that he will not permit a witness to blacken the reputation of an individual or group of individuals, because at first appearance he requires testimony behind closed doors and will not permit witnesses to speak in public until he is convinced that they are competent to testify upon the subject. His job is not a pleasant one. The gentleman from Massachusetts says the committee needs money to complete the investigations it has started. The question now is for the House to decide whether additional money should be voted. The committee has performed its duty. Its recommendation is before you.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, it is my observation that this investigation thus far has been conducted with great dignity and caution. I think the finest investment this Congress has ever made was the setting up of the Fish committee to conduct an investigation into a similar situation some 2 years ago. While there was no action taken on the recommendation of the Fish committee, Mr. Speaker, yet the investigation did bring to an end a character of propaganda that had been carried on in this country that looked to the overthrow of our Government.

The resolution setting up this special committee is in no wise hostile or intended as such to any nation of the world. It is simply expressive of the will of this Congress that the people of this country shall live under a government of their own making and will conduct their lives in their own way without promptings from the outside.

The Congress having authorized this investigation cannot turn back, and if, in the beginning, opinions were given upon the part of those active in bringing about the adoption of the resolution that were bad this is no reason why we should not now go all the way and give the committee all the support it needs, to the end that a thorough and a complete investigation may be made. It would have been better, Mr. Speaker, that no investigation whatever should have been entered upon if it is not to be a complete and thorough investigation.

This committee, under the chairmanship of the brilliant young son of Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], is entitled to the confidence and the support of this House, and the chairman of the committee, in his statement to the House, has declared that the committee needs $40,000 to complete its work; and the committee, holding the confidence of its fellows, is entitled to support at this time and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the House will give the committee the $40,000 for which it has asked. We may be certain that if the fund is not needed it will not be expended. Certainly reasonable economy will be practiced and if the set-up is too elaborate it will be reduced to the minimum.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as one of the minority members of this special committee, I want to take occasion to endorse all that the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] has said. I am also in accord with the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

I think the evidence that has already been adduced before this committee has abundantly justified its existence and what has already been spent, but in order to carry out the plans and make this investigation a thorough one, I think $40,000 will be a very small amount, indeed.

So far as the investigators and the other employees of the special committee are concerned, I may say that not one of them has been appointed upon my recommendation, but I have had some contact with them and I think all of them have performed good work, especially this man Randolph, whom some have sought to ridicule this morning. There is not a more efficient servant of any committee in the House than Mr. Randolph. He is a real, high-class, competent man, and instead of being ridiculed he is entitled to high commendation.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. It may be true that we owe the committee every consideration; but is it not a fact that we owe greater consideration to the taxpayers of this country, and if these 13 investigators, in order to make their jobs good, bring in some proof, then you will come before the next Congress asking another $40,000?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. We are not only trying to protect the taxpayers, but we are trying to protect the American people against this subversive propaganda and activity, which is of the greatest importance. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Accounts, when this resolution was brought before the committee all that was asked for was $25,000, as has been stated. There were quite a few of the Committee on Accounts at that time who did not believe such an investigation should be made, but the Committee on Accounts allowed $10,000 to start the investigation. It was then agreed between the Committee on Accounts and the introducer of the resolution if they made a showing with this $10,000, when they came back to the Committee on Accounts the next time the committee would appropriate the balance of the $25,000.

I say to you that the Committee on Accounts was astonished when they came back and asked for $40,000 instead of $15,000, which would have made the $25,000 they asked for at first.

So the great respect the Committee on Accounts had for the originator of this resolution, the chairman of the investigating committee, and for the membership of that committee, the Committee on Accounts raised the $15,000, the balance of which they asked for first, and granted them $20,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, while I happen to be a member of the investigating committee, it was not from my choice. I was put on it without my request. I had no ax to grind. If this was a political matter, I want to say that I do not have 20 Jews in one precinct of my city, but I have 50,000 Germans and Americans of German descent.

Now, as to the work the committee is doing, I want to say that the chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] is doing a fine piece of work. We are proposing to do what the mandate of Congress told us to do, that is, to investigate any and all subversive and un-American activities and to report back to Congress.

There are a lot of things that I would rather do this summer than go on this investigation—I will give up my place tomorrow to any Member who wants it. It is not a picnic, I assure you.

The House instructed this committee to investigate certain communistic activities, and those movements that try to make people out of harmony with the ideas that we want to accomplish—to investigate organizations from foreign governments. Mr. Koebele, of New York City, the attorney of Gissibl, Walther, and the Friends of New Germany, a citizen of German extraction, has been satisfied with the conduct and fairness of your committee on behalf of the German-American citizens and societies, and has complimented your chairman and all the committee members on the way we are handling this matter. It would be worth it if it cost $100,000, if we could assist one race to get along with another race, to live together in harmony, without bearing any malice toward each other. It is the American principle of justice and fair play that this committee would like to instill into the hearts and minds of some of our newly arrived brothers in America. The committee does not intend to do anything except see that its own decisions are free from prejudice and malice. If there are being developed in this country classes and political philosophies that are un-American we shall try to find that out if we can.

No one can claim credit for his nationality if they are proud of it, because birth is conceived without our assistance and beyond our control; some are born white, some brown, some yellow, and some black, the circumstances over which no individual could control. Our religion we inherit generally from our mothers, and seldom change it, preferring to remain of the faith into which we were born, in respect to our parents. After all, when our span of life is over, and the day of accounting comes, we all hope to arrive in the same heaven, though we take different courses in our journey through life.

It is immaterial to me whether or not this appropriation is made. If this House and the Speaker command us to carry on, we will. If the wish of the House is otherwise the committee will close its books and retire to their various homes and families, and live among their friends at home. We shall, if directed by you, carry on our duty faithfully and justly, and report, when directed, to Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we ought to be governed by the statements made about the $25,000. At that time, when we were discussing the investigation, we figured on about the cost of $25,000. But, gentlemen, since this investigation was started we have been reliably informed that there was a certain movement in this country where money was being brought in to support communism, and we were also advised since the adoption of the resolution authorizing this investigation that there is another well-organized body that is spreading propaganda, originating from another country, which also is subversive to our form of government. In other words, since the adoption of that resolution the committee has positively received and heard sworn testimony that there are other groups in this country that require checking in order that the full purposes of House Resolution 198 may be accomplished.

I do not know why you gentlemen are all alarmed about this small additional amount of money if the committee gets results. I challenge the whole House to read the record. I am willing to stand on the record of hundreds of pages of some of the most important revelations that have ever been made in this Republic. The committee revealed to you in public hearings only a few days ago that paid, organized propaganda running into hundreds of thousands of dollars was directed by the German Government; and I say that you ought to thank this committee and acknowledge that they are doing a good job, instead of attempting to belittle the committee by serious consideration of any amount less than the $40,000 asked for by this committee in this resolution.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In a moment. It is ridiculous to sit here in the House and listen to some of our colleagues, particularly the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CARPENTER], misrepresent the purposes of this investigation to their constitutents as to its objects.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. It is just as obnoxious to me as it is to the gentleman.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will give the gentleman something that I want him to read. On March 20 he told this Congress that he represented 750,000 Germans in his district or in his State. That is the gentleman's language.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. And the gentleman also said that he had a letter of recommendation——

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Wait a minute. I call the gentleman's attention to this. I have no personal quarrel with the gentleman; I have the highest respect for him as a man; but, for God's sake, please, when you get on the floor be fair to me and to your colleagues.

On Tuesday, March 20, 1934, the gentleman, while expressing his opposition to the adoption of House Resolution 198, is recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as having said—I quote:

> I think I can radiate some of the sentiment of truly German people, because I come from a State that has 750,000 Germans. I think this investigation is an affront upon the dignity of the German people of my State and should not be passed—I represent the German people, and they are in entire sympathy and accord with the form of government that now prevails in Germany, and, as I understand it, it is a great improvement over what they did have—The only Germans I spoke for were the 750,000 in the State of Nebraska, not for your Germans.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I prepared a little table of facts taken from the official records of the United States Government census of 1930, and from that table I desire to call attention to the following interesting figures.

In the Fifth Congressional District of Nebraska, which my colleague represents in this Congress, there were found only 25,225 persons from under 1 year of age to over 75 years of age who were either born in Germany or born in the United States of parents either of whom were born in Germany.

In the whole State of Nebraska, which my colleague said had 750,000 Germans, there were found only 168,329 persons from under 1 year of age to over 75 years of age who were either born in Germany or born in the United States of parents either of whom were born in Germany.

The gentleman is recorded as having said on March 20, 1934:

> I represent the German people, and they are in entire sympathy and accord with the form of government that now prevails in Germany.

Mr. Speaker, this is the Congress of the Representatives of the American people, and we should be concerned with the preservation of the form of government that our Constitution guarantees to the people of the United States in America, and that is the concern of this special committee as authorized by your vote here on March 20, 1934, when you adopted House Resolution 198.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. What has the population of the gentleman's State got to do with the $40,000 that the committee wants?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman made a statement that he represented 750,000 Germans, and my answer to him is that the American-German people have begged for this thorough housecleaning in this country, whether it is in his State or some other State.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. I challenge the gentleman's statement on that fact.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Here is your record. The gentleman can have it, and here are some photostatic copies of it.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman conceive of any patriotic American, whether of German or Russian origin, objecting to the American Congress conducting an investigation into matters subversive of the American Government?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I thank my colleague for that question. I answer no. I cannot conceive of any reason why any Member of this House, elected to represent a portion of the American people in this Congress, should represent his own constituents as objecting to a committee of this House trying to find facts relating to sources of direction, financial support, and dissemination here of destructive and subversive propaganda that seems to attack the principles of government upon which this United States was founded and has prospered for over 150 years.

The facts about these subversive activities directed and financed from abroad, which this special committee has been directed to find, cannot harm any American citizen, nor even any alien resident in the United States, who is attached to the principles of our Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some critical statements have been made against the action of this special committee whereby it appointed as committee secretary a man who had previously been carried on the pay roll of this House as janitor of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. Mr. Speaker, that action of the committee is correct, but the criticism is unjust.

My colleagues on the other side of the aisle who are members of this special committee, and who are, or have been, on the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the gentleman from Ohio and the gentlemen from Tennessee, have expressed commendation of the ability of Mr. Randolph.

I want to say that for a long time I have paid from my own pocket a considerable sum to Mr. Randolph, who has been the official janitor for the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization ever since I have been chairman of that committee. The official clerk of that committee has been unable to do all of the work required in connection with this very active committee, and to many of you Mr. Randolph has been known as the assistant clerk. I have arranged additional pay for him so that he might receive a total salary in keeping with his services, which have been invaluable to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization for several years.

Mr. Randolph rendered unusual service last autumn during all the time a subcommittee of the Immigration and Naturalization Committee conducted the informal investigation of this un-American Nazi propaganda. His expert knowledge of procedure and of the thousands of communications in the files, together with his native ability, convinced me that no one was better fitted to fill the important position of clerk, or secretary, for this special committee, and I am glad to say that Mr. Randolph was elected to that position and given the salary he receives now by the unanimous vote of the entire membership of this special committee.

Knowing Mr. Randolph as I do, I feel this special committee has made no mistake in selecting him as committee secretary, and I know he will earn, and is worth to the committee, the salary paid him now. This office and salary is a worthy promotion given to a faithful public employee.

Criticism of the committee, for his selection and for the payment to him of the salary indicated in this debate, is absolutely unwarranted as an argument against the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman let me have half a minute more?

Mr. WARREN. I am sorry, but I have only 5 minutes more, and that has already been pledged.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am a close personal friend of our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK]. I have absolute confidence in him.

When this matter was first before us on this floor I called attention to the fact that the resolution would permit the employment of a lot of high-salaried unnecessary employees for the investigating committee, and that we ought to prevent that by limiting the expense. We were assured that, although the language permitted it, they would not be employed. Today our good friend, the Chairman of the Committee on Accounts, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], than whom there is not a more valuable man in this Congress, has shown us that since we passed the resolution and gave them the first $10,000, they have employed 1 lawyer at $555 a month, another assistant lawyer at $388 a month, 2 investigators at $230 each per month, 8 more investigators at $225 each per month, another investigator at $165 per month, another one at $145 a month, a secretary at $330 a month, and a messenger at $20 per week. There are too many high-salaried employees for one investigating committee of this House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have only a little time and I am sorry that I cannot yield. The gentleman knows the high regard I have for him. How long are we going to continue? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] offered an amendment to limit the expense to $25,000 as a maximum, but the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] defeated it by a point of order.

There are seven of the most distinguished lawyers in the Nation on this investigating committee. Where will you find a more distinguished lawyer than our splendid colleague from Massachusetts, JOHN W. MCCORMACK, one of the high-class lawyers of the Nation, and he has six big lawyers on the committee with him. Why do they not conduct the legal side of that investigation for this Congress?

Oh, I remember, away back yonder when I was a youngster in this House, when I began to investigate the fraud and corruption connected with the guardianship of the insane and shell-shocked veterans in some insane hospitals, I had to file impeachment charges against one of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, Col. Frederick A. Fenning. I remember that when I began that investigation the newspapers said my charges ought to be thrown into the wastebasket, and that I ought to be put out of Congress, and I was attacked from both sides of the aisle by those partisan friends who were upholding Commissioner Fenning. I conducted that investigation myself without any help from Congress, first before the Gibson committee, and later before the Judiciary Committee. When I finally had to file impeachment charges against Colonel Fenning I conducted the prosecution of Mr. Fenning myself without a bit of help before the Committee on the Judiciary for days and days. I brought witnesses from Texas, from Massachusetts, from Boston, where Mr. MCCORMACK lives; I brought them from New York, from Kentucky, from Virginia and Maryland, and other States, questioned them myself, and produced their testimony before the committee, and I forced that infamous scoundrel to resign and make restitution to the shell-shocked soldiers.

In said investigations, Col. Frederick A. Fenning had present as his counsel representing him and trying in every possible way to block my evidence against him, the renowned criminal lawyer here, Frank J. Hogan, who received, it was reputed, a fee of a million dollars for defending Doheny, Sinclair, and Secretary Fall, and also two other skillful lawyers here, Levi Cooke and Thomas B. Littlepage. I did not hesitate to carry on such investigations. I gave over 3 months of my time to it. I did some of the hardest work of my whole life. I spent several thousand dollars of my own money. I employed my own detectives. I paid the expenses of witnesses out of my own pocket. Not one dollar did Congress give me to employ investigators. Not one dollar did this Congress give me to employ counsel. Not one dollar did this Congress give me to pay the expenses of witnesses. I had to do all that myself and to pay all of the expenses out of my own pocket.

It does occur to me that when we have seven able and well-qualified lawyers from this Congress on this investigating committee, they could furnish the necessary legal work themselves to carry on this investigation. They already have quite a good-sized sum of money on hand unspent that has been appropriated for them.

They have $5,800 left in cash, have they not, Mr. Chairman? Yes; it is admitted they still have $5,800 left in cash. I want to say that JOHN MCCORMACK can take that money and with his splendid shrewdness and ability as a lawyer, with the help of his six colleagues, who are lawyers, and their splendid ability, give you an investigation that will bring out all the facts in connection with this Nazi propaganda. I know he will do it. I am in favor of cutting him down to this $10,000 already appropriated. I am in favor of not voting another cent. They will do the work. JOHN MCCORMACK will perform his duty and fill this position with dignity and credit and honor to the House and to himself and to the State of Massachusetts and to the Nation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution, as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. YOUNG) there were—ayes 170, noes 37.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. And make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. YOUNG. And make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-seven Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. As many in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and remain standing until counted.

Mr. BLANTON. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Eleven Members have arisen; not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. As many in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will stand and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Fifteen Members have arisen; not a sufficient number.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

PHILIPPINE CURRENCY ON DEPOSIT IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 9459) relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, when the funds therefor are made available, to establish on the books of the Treasury a credit in favor of the treasurer of the Philippine Islands for $23,862,750.78, being an amount equal to the increase in value (resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar) of the gold equivalent at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, of the balances maintained at that time in banks in the continental United States by the Government of the Philippine Islands for its gold standard fund and its treasury certificate fund less the interest received by it on such balances.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the receipts covered into the Treasury under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, by virtue of the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar by the proclamation of the President on January 31, 1934, the amount necessary to establish the credit provided for in section 1 of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am opposed to the bill; yes, sir.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, this legislation is recommended by the President of the United States and approved by two Cabinet members, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, also the Director of the Budget, the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and the Governor General of the Philippine Islands. I submit the letters from the President and others:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 7, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: With the approval of the United States, the government of the Philippine Islands has for many years maintained in banks in this country the major portion of the currency reserves of its monetary system, and has always considered these deposits the equivalent of a gold reserve.

The effect of my proclamation of January 31, 1934, was not only to reduce, in terms of gold, the value of these currency reserves, but indirectly to devalue, in terms of gold, the entire currency circulation of the Philippine Islands. The United States enjoyed an increase in the value of its currency reserves corresponding to the decrease in the value of the dollar.

As the Philippine currency is interlocked with the United States gold dollar under laws enacted by the United States Congress, it would be equitable to reestablish the Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States at their former gold value as of January 31, 1934.

I am advised that H.R. 9459, now under consideration before your committee, is designed to accomplish this purpose.

I recommend its enactment.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 4, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: I am writing to your committee to request favorable consideration of H.R. 9459, which was introduced in the House at the request of this Department.

The purpose of this bill is to credit the Philippine government with the profits, due to the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar, on its currency reserves deposited in the United States at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, and authorizing the appropriation of funds for this purpose.

The draft of this bill was prepared in consultation by officials of the Treasury Department and of this Department, and has received the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

At the suggestion of the War Department the major portion of the currency reserves of the Philippine monetary system has been maintained in the form of United States currency deposits in banks in the continental United States. The Philippine government has always considered these deposits as the equivalent of a gold reserve.

The proclamation of the President issued on January 31, 1934, reduced the gold content of the dollar. The effect of this proclamation was not only to reduce, in terms of gold, the value of the Philippine currency reserve funds, but indirectly to devalue, in terms of gold, the entire currency circulation of the Philippine Islands. The United States, on the other hand, enjoyed an increase in the value of its currency reserves corresponding to the decrease in the value of the dollar. As the Philippine currency is interlocked with the United States gold dollar under laws enacted by the United States Congress, it is equitable that any change in the dollar which produces a profit on the currency reserves of the general government should produce a corresponding profit on the currency reserves of this dependency.

The reestablishment of its currency reserves as of their former gold value of January 31, 1934, would be of great advantage to the Philippine government in their affairs at the present time. It is hoped that an appropriation providing for this purpose can also be secured at the present session of Congress.

I am enclosing copy of a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget in which he advised me that the expenditure contemplated by the proposed bill would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

There is also enclosed for your information a copy of a memorandum prepared in the Bureau of Insular Affairs, which sets forth in detail the necessity for this legislation. Should you desire further information regarding this matter it is suggested that you call upon Brig. Gen. Creed F. COX, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of this Department.

I urgently recommend the early enactment of H.R. 9459.

Sincerely yours,

GEO. H. DERN, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 2, 1934.

Hon. JOHN MCDUFFIE,
Chairman Committee on Insular Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCDUFFIE: I am transmitting herewith a draft of a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to credit the Philippine government with the profits, due to the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar, on its currency reserves deposited in the United States at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, and appropriating funds for this purpose.

This bill has been prepared in consultation with officials of the Treasury Department and of this Department, and has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands. It is understood that the President has also indicated his approval of this legislation.

I am also enclosing for your information a copy of a memrandum prepared in the Bureau of Insular Affairs, which sets forth in detail the necessity for this legislation. Should you desire further information regarding this matter, it is suggested that you call upon Brig. Gen. Creed F. Fox, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of this Department.

I urgently recommend that the bill herewith be introduced in the Congress with a view to securing its enactment during the present session.

A similar letter enclosing a draft of this bill has been sent to the Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

GEO. H. DERN, Secretary of War.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 10, 1934.

Hon. JOHN MCDUFFIE,
Chairman Committee on Insular Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: At the request of the War Department, I am pleased to advise you that the bill H.R. 9459 provided as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed [, when the funds therefor are made available,] to establish on the books of the Treasury a credit in favor of the treasurer of the Philippine Islands for $23,862,750.78, being an amount equal to the increase in value [resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar] of the gold equivalent at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, of the balances maintained at that time in banks in the continental United States by the government of the Philippine Islands for its gold-standard fund and its treasury-certificate fund less the interest received by it on such balances.

"SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the receipts covered into the Treasury under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, by virtue of the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar by the proclamation of the President on January 31, 1934, the amount necessary to establish the credit provided [for] in section 1 of this act,"— which, I understand, has been recommended by the War Department, in view of the circumstances surrounding the deposits in the continental United States of the currency reserves of the Philippine Islands, a dependency of the United States, in principle meets with the approval of the Treasury Department.

I should, however, favor amendments inserting into the bill the phrases set out in brackets which, I understand, are contained in S. 3530, and meet with the approval of the War Department.

Respectfully,

H. MORGENTHAU,
Secretary of the Treasury.

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET.
Washington, May 3, 1934.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your letter of April 25, concerning the proposed bill relative to Philippine currency reserves deposited in the United States, and to the informal submission by your Bureau of Insular Affairs on April 30 of a redraft of a new bill (being a redraft of sec. 2 of a bill submitted to the President on Mar. 23) reading as follows:

"A bill relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to establish on the books of the Treasury a credit in favor of the treasurer of the Philippine Islands for $23,862,750.78, being an amount equal to the increase in value (resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar) of the gold equivalent at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, of the balances maintained at that time in banks in the continental United States by the government of the Philippine Islands for its gold-standard fund and its treasury-certificate fund less the interest received by it on such balances. There is hereby appropriated, out of the receipts to be covered into the Treasury under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, by virtue of the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar by the proclamation of the President on January 31, 1934, an amount necessary to establish such credit."

In reply you are informed that the expenditures contemplated by the proposed bill would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very truly yours,

L. W. DOUGLAS, Director.

The necessity for this legislation grows out of the proclamation of the President of January 31, 1934, the result of which obviously was the broadening of the base of our currency reserves. We revalued the gold dollar and credited ourselves on our books with approximately $2,800,000,000, the difference in the value of gold prior to and after the proclamation of the President.

This bill, of course, deals with the currency reserve funds of a dependent people, a people who have necessarily done everything, not only with reference to their currency and financial affairs but with reference to everything else which goes to make up the life of the Filipino, suggested by those in authority in the United States. The result of the President's proclamation, January 31, 1934, by reason of the fact that the Philippine currency reserve fund, on which their circulation is based, was deposited in dollars but not in actual gold, was a contraction of that fund. I hope I have made that clear. While the proclamation of the President expanded the reserves of our Government, the insular currency reserve fund, being deposited in the United States in dollars, although treated by both governments as of a gold value, has been contracted by the proclamation. It throws out of balance the relative position of their currency and ours. The Philippine currency was fixed by the action of this Congress in 1903. I submit here the language of that act, which gave a value based on the gold dollar to the peso—2 pesos to $1:

Be if enacted, etc., That the unit of value in the Philippine Islands shall be the gold peso, consisting of 12.9 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, said gold peso to become the unit of value when the government of the Philippine Islands shall have coined and ready for or in circulation not less than 5,000,000 of the silver pesos hereinafter provided for in this act, and the gold coins of the United States at the rate of $1 for 2 pesos hereinafter authorized to be coined shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, in the Philippine Islands.

Therefore, their currency is different from ours but interlocked with it by law. If we were to give them credit to the same relative extent that we took on our own books in our Treasury, the amount would be $39,000,000 plus instead of $23,000,000 plus, but those in authority here, the experts in the Treasury Department, the Secretary of War, the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and all who have studied this problem and discussed it with the President, arrived at the conclusion that it was equitable to deduct the interest which the reserve funds have drawn since 1923, amounting to some $15,000,000, from the $39,000,000, leaving the balance of approximately $23,000,000. To be exact in the figures, on January 31, 1934, the insular government had on deposit in our banks, designated as depositories by the Secretary of War, $56,276,056.92. Applying the same revaluation as given our gold dollar by the President, this fund would amount to $95,282,398.87, or an increase, had those deposits been in gold, of $39,006,341.95. We do not propose the full credit here but have deducted the interest received by the insular government since 1923 on their reserve funds, amounting to $15,143,591.17. The insular government had a right to ask that their reserve fund be translated into gold, and they began to urge this soon after the depression came upon us and from time to time thereafter.

During the fall of 1932 the government of the Philippine Islands made representations to this Government with a view of including specific stipulation in the depository agreements that withdrawal of their currency reserve funds should be in gold coin of the United States at the election of the Philippine government. The Secretary of War, through the Bureau of Insular Affairs, acting for this Government, stated that he did not "deem as expedient the amendment of the depository agreement as suggested by the Philippine government."

I also call your attention to the fact that as late as March 1933, 10 months prior to the President's proclamation, other representations were made on the part of the Philippine government seeking the assurance that deposits of the Philippine government in the United States stand on an equal basis with the deposits of the United States Government and recommended that all deposits of the insular government, except $10,000,000 required for ordinary expenses, be deposited in the Treasury of the United States. Under conditions obtaining in this country in 1932 and 1933, the officials of our Government deemed it inadvisable to accede to any of these requests, although the dependent government had every right to make these requests and to expect them to be granted.

Again on June 29, 1933, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands officially requested that—

Our gold standard and Treasury certificate funds be converted into gold coin of the standard existing at the time these deposits were made with the depository banks; this coin to be deposited in the United States Treasury or Federal Reserve banks and authority of the President secured to earmark it for their account by amending the Executive order of April 5, 1933 (which was the first order of the President restricting the circulation of gold). There will be, however, no necessity for withdrawing the above-mentioned deposits from the present depository banks at this time if it is possible to obtain Government assurance that conversion into gold of the standard existing, as above outlined, may be made at a later date.

From time to time between June 29, 1933, and January 17, 1934, numerous cables were sent by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands expressing concern and stressing the necessity for assuring the gold content of the Philippine reserves on deposit in the United States. Likewise a letter on January 16, 1934, from the acting secretary of finance of the Philippine Islands was sent to the Secretary of War again expressing the desire of the Philippine government that their deposits be treated by the United States Treasury as deposits of coined gold. This request was in turn sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Secretary of War on January 17, 1934.

On January 17, 1934, 2 weeks prior to the Presidential proclamation, the following cable was sent by Governor General Murphy to the Secretary of War:

Referring to telegram from this office June 29, no. 212, in particular, as well as other previous cables pertaining to Philippine currency. Have you further information relative to earmarking in gold Treasury certificates funds and the gold-standard fund? Believe allotment of gold to these funds on the basis of present gold content is but fair to Philippines, thus granting Philippine government same advantage as United States in reduction of content of gold dollars backing gold-standard fund and Treasury-certificate fund. Am exceedingly anxious to receive definite decision.

At any time, following these representations, prior to January 31, 1934, the Treasury Department could have lawfully sold to the Philippine government gold in the amount of their currency reserves on deposit in the United States at the old value of $20.67 an ounce, or could have authorized the earmarking of gold to be paid for by the Philippine government with the funds on deposit in the United States. This, however, was not done, although the insular government from time to time has been given assurance by our officials that their interests would be equitably adjusted.

Our Government, not having acceded to these suggestions and requests, is certainly morally obligated to expand the base of the currency reserves of the dependent government and to do so without further delay in order to avoid further possible domestic and international financial complications.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Wherein are the Philippines in a different position than the citizen holding gold bonds?

Mr. McDUFFIE. The Philippines have a different currency from ours, though it is interlocked with ours by law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The Filipinos suffered from the deflation of the dollar just as every holder of a gold bond, even issues of the United States, suffered. Why make the American citizens take a loss when the Filipinos are to be allowed to take a profit?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not think the gentleman's position is correct. We are not taking a loss; we are dividing our gain. Our Government has taken a profit on its gold. We wish to give these people a new value of their reserve fund which was treated as gold but was in dollars. We could have sold them gold and this bill would not have been presented.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. The answer is that we are not dealing with individuals. This bill deals with the Philippine government which is entitled to the same rate of profit as the United States.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY], a very able and fair legislator, has given thought and study to this problem and while he does not agree with the policy of this administration as to our gold standard, he does agree that this legislation is needed from a standpoint of equity and good conscience. Of course this Government is not bound technically to pass this bill, but we are, as a matter of fair dealing with a dependent government by a superior one, in conscience bound to do so. What will the great nations of the world say of a powerful nation that denies this simple justice? Mr. WELCH, the gentleman from California, a member of the committee, who likewise understands this problem, also gave his approval to this bill. This bill is one that must appeal to the conscience and sense of fair play of the Congress.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands [Mr. GUEVARA].

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, after the brilliant presentation made by the Chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE], of the bill under consideration, and after the cogent and lucid report on this bill, further explanation is superfluous. I wish, nevertheless, to say a few words.

I believe that as a matter of justice and equity the Philippine government should be credited with the amount recommended in the bill now under consideration because, by virtue of the proclamation of the President of the United States on January 31, 1934, the United States Government made a profit of $2,700,000,000, but included in this profit is the $23,000,000 which represents the share of the Philippine government for its money deposited in the United States banks.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. All we are doing by this bill is to give the Philippine government their proportionate credit growing out of the devaluation of the gold dollar by the United States Government.

Mr. GUEVARA. Exactly.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GUEVARA. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. And would it be fair to say that the credit to be allowed to the Philippine Islands in this bill is a credit growing out of the currency operations of the United States Government?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. But this transaction does not involve any transfer of gold?

Mr. GUEVARA. Not at all. The position of the President of the United States and of the Committee on Insular Affairs is just to give the Philippine government its fair share of the profit derived by the Government of the United States when it devalued its gold dollar.

ADJUSTMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE CURRENCY RESERVES

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 9459, introduced by Representative McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and recommended favorably by a majority of that committee, deals with the currency reserves of the Philippines. I join in urging its approval.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to credit the treasurer of the Philippines in the sum of $23,862,750.78, representing the net profit on the deposits of the Philippine government in banks in continental United States, aggregating $56,276,056.92, as the result of the President's proclamation reducing the gold content of the dollar.

The pertinent facts bearing on the present subject are as follows:

By the act of Congress of March 14, 1900, the weight of the gold dollar was fixed at 25.8 grains, 0.9 fine.

On January 31, 1934, pursuant to the Gold Reserve Act of January 30, 1934, the President, by proclamation, reduced the gold content of the dollar to 15 5/11 grains, 0.9 fine, a reduction of 59.06 plus percent.

Under the Gold Reserve Act aforementioned title to all monetary gold in the United States, including the gold coin and gold bullion heretofore held by the Federal Reserve banks and the claim upon gold in the Treasury represented by gold certificates, is vested in the United States Government.

By virtue of this, as a result of the reduction of the gold content of the dollar a profit of approximately $2,811,013,126 accrued to the United States Treasury upon the signing of the proclamation by the President at 3:10 in the afternoon of January 31, 1934.

Pursuant to the Gold Reserve Act and the President's proclamation, $2,000,000,000 of the profit was constituted into a stabilization fund under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury and the balance was authorized to be covered into the general fund of the Treasury.

The foregoing is by way of a background. The material facts as to the Philippines are as follows:

The Philippine monetary system was established by the act of Congress of March 2, 1903. It made the gold peso the unit of value, containing 12.9 grains, 0.9 fine, or exactly one-half of the gold content of the dollar prior to its devaluation.

By authority of the above-mentioned act, the Philippine Commission on October 10, 1903, approved Act. No. 938, placing the Philippine monetary system on the gold-exchange standard and providing that a part of the then gold-standard fund be deposited in banks in continental United States.

On June 13, 1922, by virtue of the act of Congress of August 29, 1916, known as the "Jones law", the Philippine Legislature enacted Act No. 3058, reconstituting the Philippine currency reserves with the establishment of the gold-standard fund and the Treasury certificate fund.

The reconstituted currency reserve fund, made up of those two funds, was inaugurated on January 2, 1923.

Upon the suggestion and direction of the Secretary of War, the major portion of the currency-reserve fund was deposited in banks in the United States which were members of the Federal Reserve System. The deposits have always been considered and taken as the equivalent of a gold reserve.

Prior to the President's proclamation, if the request of the Philippine government had been granted, the Treasury could have sold to that government gold at $20.67 per fine troy ounce as against the rate of $35 as thereafter fixed, or it could have earmarked gold coin for its account of the standard then existing to the amount of the currency-reserve deposits. Were either alternative done, the Philippine government would automatically have received proportional increment on its deposits as a consequence of the dollar devaluation.

As neither alternative was effectuated by decision of the competent departments of the United States Government, the base of the Philippine currency system was contracted to the extent of the consequent reduction in value of the currency reserves. This not only represents a loss in those reserves, but also diminished the equivalent metallic support of the Philippine monetary circulation.

On January 31, 1934, the day of the President's proclamation, the Philippine currency reserves on deposit in some 45 banks in continental United States designated by the Secretary of War amounted to $56,276,056.92. Of this sum, $19,112,253.42 pertained to the gold-standard fund and $37,163,803.50 to the Treasury certificate fund.

As computed by the United States Treasury Department, the profit which accrued to the Philippine government on these deposits as the result of the dollar devaluation amounted to $39,006,341.95. This figure was arrived at by considering the sum of $56,276,056.92 as the gold bullion value of said deposits and then converting it into currency at the new dollar value, thus producing the aggregate sum of $95,276,056.92.

But the net profit which the Treasury Department recommends crediting to the Philippine Treasury, in which the War Department concurs, is the sum of $23,862,750.78, the sum sought to be authorized in H.R. 9459 under consideration.

This amount is the increment of $39,006,341.95, mentioned above, minus $15,143,591.17, representing the sum total of the interest earned by the currency reserve deposits during the period from January 2, 1923, to January 30, 1934. It is pointed out that the interest would not have accrued if the currency reserves had been maintained in metal.

In the light of the foregoing exposition of facts, it seems only just and proper that the Philippine government be placed in funds to have its currency reserves on an exactly the same relative position after the dollar devaluation as prior to it, thereby maintaining and preserving its base from contraction.

The Philippine peso, being interlocked and interrelated with the American dollar on the basis of 2 to 1 in intrinsic content by virtue of an act of Congress, goes up and down with the American dollar in its fundamental fluctuations.

I wish to mention two cases as examples where the Philippine government is actually footing appreciable losses by reason of the dollar devaluation, which also show the sympathetic movement of the peso with the dollar and its consequent advantages and disadvantages as the case may be.

Section 6 of the Philippine Tariff Act of 1909, which is still in force and effect, provides that the rates of duty while stated in American money in the act shall be payable in Philippine currency on the basis of the liquidated value. The provision sets forth a schedule of foreign moneys and their equivalent in dollar and peso. By reason of the devaluation of the dollar it is estimated that the Philippine government will suffer an annual loss of around $3,250,000.

The other case relates to the bonds of the Manila Railroad Co., a Philippine government enterprise. These bonds are payable at the option of the boldholder either in Swiss francs, English pounds, Holland florins, or other designated foreign money at the rate of exchange existing in 1909. Some of the bonds have already matured, and their redemption is being made and losses are being incurred by reason of the depreciated position of the American dollar in the international exchanges. If the entire bond issues were to mature during the life of the Presidential proclamation, the Philippine government would have to pay approximately an additional $10,000,000, representing the dollar exchange depreciation.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this session of Congress will see the approval of H.R. 9459. It is urgent to forestall economic complications and to prevent financial debilitation in the Philippines. President Roosevelt recommends its enactment. The Secretary of the Treasury approves it. The Secretary of War urges its passage. And the Budget Director declares that it is not in conflict with the President's financial program.

In concluding, I wish to express my grateful appreciation to the Committee on Insular Affairs for its favorable recommendation of the bill, and I want particularly to mention the untiring and unselfish efforts of Chairman McDUFFIE and the very cogent and lucid report that he wrote. I desire also to say that our Governor General, Frank Murphy; the Acting Secretary of Finance, Mr. V. Singson Encarnacion; and the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, Brig. Gen. Creed F. COX, deserve the grateful acknowledgment of the Filipino people for their work in connection with the question under consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD in an extension of remarks a memorandum prepared by Mr. Encarnacion, acting secretary of finance, secretary of agriculture and commerce, and other letters bearing on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following memorandum of Hon. V. Singson Encarnacion, acting secretary of finance, secretary of agriculture and commerce:

THE ISSUE

On April 5, 1933, the Philippine government had on deposit in the United States in depositaries of the Philippine government for the normal uses of the government approximately $8,000,000. In addition the Philippine government had on deposit in branches of the Philippine treasury in the United States approximately $52,000,000. These latter funds were the treasury-certificate fund and the gold-standard fund for the special purposes of the Philippine currency system. The gold-standard fund was in excess of the maximum legal requirement for that fund, containing about $9,000,000 which, though not legally earmarked, it was hoped to use in payment of indebtedness of the government.

The Philippine government's position is that the funds in the branches of the Philippine treasury in the United States should be made available to it in gold coin of the United States.

THE EQUITIES

The Philippine government has been referred to by American Presidents and American leaders as a "ward" of the United States. In nothing has this relationship been more clear and more continuous than in the handling of its public funds.

Illustrating this, the Philippine government is not permitted to borrow money except as authorized by Congress, which has at times indicated the specific purpose and the specific amount which might be borrowed, and has always prescribed a limit which could not be exceeded.

Prior to the passage of the Organic Law of 1916, Congress had drawn the currency laws of the Philippine Islands, authorizing the Philippine government to take certain action within the terms of such laws. Since 1916 the Philippine government has been authorized to legislate in this field, but with the provisions "nor shall any act of the Philippine Legislature affecting the currency or coinage laws of the Philippines become a law until it has been approved by the President of the United States."

The Philippine government has been encouraged by congressional legislation to borrow money, when necessary and authorized, in the United States, which required, in turn, that the obligation should be paid in the United States. It has been encouraged by tariff legislation to make its purchases in the United States, which, in turn, necessitated the maintenance of balances in the United States.

Since the enactment of the Fedral Reserve Act in 1913 it has been required to maintain its deposit in the United States in banks of the Federal Reserve System.

As a result of the foregoing and as a consequence of acts of Congress, the Philippine government has normally kept in the United States funds for the purchase of supplies, funds to meet the interest and principal on its debts, and funds required to be so kept under the laws governing the Philippine currency.

The foregoing are not enumerated by way of complaint. There is no proper complaint. The system has been advantageous to the Philippine government and to the Philippine people. But they are enumerated to make clear that the Philippine government in equity should participate in any profit that accrues to the United States Government as a result of a change in its currency which changes pari pasu the Philippine currency.

Not only will the currency system of the Philippine Islands be affected by the changes that have taken place in the relationship of United States legal-tender money to the gold standard but also obligations of the Philippine government which are in part at least held abroad calling for payment in foreign currency at a rate of exchange fixed with reference to the old gold value of the United States dollar to the currency in question.

For example, the Philippine government owns the Manila Railroad Co. Thirty million pesos of bonds of this company will mature in 1939 and the Philippine government is under obligation to redeem these bonds at the option of the holder in Swiss francs, English pounds, or Holland florins, etc., at the rate of exchange existing in 1909.

Briefly, this would mean that the Philippine deposits in the United States should be made good to the Philippine government in United States gold as of the date when change in the United States currency is made effective.

The foregoing has to do with the equity of the situation.

ADMINISTRATIVE ADJUSTMENT

A reading of the President's Executive order of August 28, 1933, which seems to embrace all pertinent matters, included in the two preceding Executive orders of April 5, 1933, and April 20, 1933, on this general subject lead to the conclusion that the Executive orders had in no way in a contemplation a situation just like that of the Philippine government. It would be difficult, therefore, if not impossible, to base the action which the Philippine government desires, on any specific provision of the President's Executive order. A slight change in wording, or a construction thereof, in the full spirit of the order would, however, precisely cover the Philippine case.

Such action must apparently be taken under section 6 of the Executive order of August 28, 1933, which among other things provides:

"The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion and subject to such regulations as he may prescribe, may issue licenses authorizing—

"(a) The export of gold coin or gold bullion earmarked or held in trust since before April 20, 1933, for a recognized foreign government, foreign central banks, or the Bank for International Settlements";

* * * * * * * *

"(b) The earmarking for foreign account and/or export of gold coin or gold bullion, with the approval of the President, for transactions which the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary to promote the public interest."

It will be observed at once that the two lettered paragraphs refer to foreign countries and foreign accounts and might be held, therefore, not to cover the Philippine government.

In view, however, of the fact that the currency system of the Philippine Islands is a semi-independent system, the spirit of these provisions would seem to cover the Philippine Islands.

It is believed that a reasonably liberal construction of the antecedents and the law under which the gold-standard fund and the treasury certificate fund were deposited by the Philippine government in the United States will justifiably lead to the conclusion that these funds should be earmarked for the Philippine government under paragraph (b).

Without going into all of the details, the act of June 23, 1906 (34 Stat. 453), amending section 8 of the act of March 2, 1903 (32 Stat. 954), as amended by section 10 of the act approved February 6, 1905 (33 Stat. 698), reads in part as follows:

"Provided, That the treasurer of the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the Governor General, may substitute, for any part of such silver pesos hereafter deposited, gold coin of the United States legally equivalent in value, and redeem the certificates hereafter issued in either silver pesos or such gold coin of equivalent value at the option of the treasurer: Provided further, That the amount of gold coin held in such reserve shall not at any time exceed 60 percent of the total amount of certificates outstanding."

This, it will be observed, permitted gold coin of the United States to be held in the treasury certificate fund, and limited the amount that might be so held. The amended law still required that the fund should be held in the Philippine treasury, and that the amount not in gold coin should be in coined pesos.

In 1914, due to the European war, conditions arose which demanded that if possible that part of this fund which was authorized to be in gold should be held in the United States. It was at that time being held in the vaults of the treasurer in Manila, or in the treasury vaults under military protection on Corregidor.

The Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, in requesting an opinion of the Judge Advocate General, suggested that this gold could be handled in any one of three following ways:

"(a) One million dollars gold could be placed in one of the Philippine depositaries in the United States to the credit of 'treasurer Philippine Islands, certificate reserve', and held to be used as such reserve.

"(b) One million dollars could be placed in the Treasury of the United States and be similarly held.

"(c) One million dollars could be placed in a depositary in New York City with instructions of the treasurer of the Philippine Islands that it should be used by the bank for the payment of the Philippine certificates on demand and used for no other purpose."

The Judge Advocate General advised:

"I can see no legal objection to either of methods (a) or (c). Both methods, under the view expressed, meet the requirements of the law that the deposits shall be held for the payment of the certificates issued against the same, and for no other purposes; and in both methods the respective Philippine depositary may be regarded as one of the branches of the Philippine treasury, within the meaning of said legislation.

"As to method (b), however, I do not know of any authority of law for the Treasury of the United States to act as a branch of the Philippine treasury, or as an agency of the Philippine treasury, for the redemption of the certificates issued against such deposits. I think, therefore, that there would be legal objections to this method of handling the matter."

In order that the banks in the United States in which this gold coin was to be deposited should be actually branches of the Philippine treasury, the Philippine Legislature, by an act of February 4, 1916, authorized the Governor General to designate such depositaries of the Philippine government in the United States as he deemed advisable to be branches of the Philippine treasury.

The record is perfectly clear that branches of the Philippine treasury, as distinguished from Philippine government depositaries, were created for the purpose of holding United States gold coin, the property of the Philippine government, and for no other purposes.

Prior to the necessity of maintaining this deposit in gold coin of the United States no suggestion had ever been made to create branches of the Philippine treasury in the United States.

The confidence in the currency system of the United States and the assurance that all legal tender money of the United States was as good as the gold coin it was generally interchangeable with, may have, and as a matter of fact did lead to loose verbiage referring to these gold deposits, but at most this could be attributed to carelessness of an individual rather than the intent of the government to have its gold deposits lose the character of such deposits.

The Philippine law today requires that the treasury certificate fund and the gold standard fund on deposit in the United States be held in branches of the Philippine treasury previously designated as such.

The branches of the Philippine treasury were created solely to hold gold coin of the Philippine government. The funds deposited in these branches, i.e., the gold-standard fund and treasury-certificate fund must be available to the Philippine government in gold, if the accomplishment of the purposes for which they are maintained are to be assured.

Enclosed is a letter of the secretary of finance of the Philippines, dated March 8, 1933, and a cablegram of the Governor General, dated March 10, 1933. These show that the Philippine government was acutely conscious of the evils that might result from any doubt that its funds in the United States were gold deposits and desired all doubts removed. They further show that if these funds were not earmarked gold deposits, with the exception of $10,000,000 it was due to conditions in the United States.

The following paragraph of the Governor General's cablegram of March 10, 1933, makes this clear:

"In view of this situation, the Secretary of Finance of the Philippine Islands, his other fiscal officers, and the President of the senate, on behalf of the leaders of the Philippine Legislature, have presented to me their views which are that with the exception of $10,000,000 necessary to carry on the ordinary transaction of the Philippine government, the funds be deposited in the United States Treasury, even though it implies foregoing the interests."

I am enclosing two letters marked one and two, written by me on April 26, 1933, and June 27, 1933, to the Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

These two letters are marked one and two; the first includes a cablegram signed "Holliday", which was transmitted to the Secretary of War on April 30, and the second includes a cablegram to the Secretary of War, signed "Murphy", sent on June 29.

These letters show how deep was the anxiety of Philippine government officials, and what efforts were made to protect Philippine government interests.

In view of the foregoing, it is hoped that the Treasury Department will earmark for the Philippine government an amount in gold equal to the gold-standard fund and treasury-certificate fund deposits in branches of the Philippine treasury in the United States on April 5, 1933. The gold so earmarked may be made available to the Philippine government under conditions which the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary to promote the public interest. If deemed advisable, any sum accruing to the Philippine government in excess of the face value of the deposits in legal-tender currency may be used in payment on the public debt of the Philippines.

V. SINGSON ENCARNACION,
Acting Secretary of Finance,
Secretary of Agriculture and Commerce.

WASHINGTON, D.C., December 27, 1933.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, my sentiment on this bill is set out in the minority views which I have filed on the subject.

If I had not asked one or two questions too many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee, I very likely would have been supporting this measure. On the face of it it looks fair that when you cut the value of our dollar, on which their currency is based, they ought to be given the benefit of that appreciation in their money. It developed, however, in the interrogation of the witnesses that every dollar of the money the Filipino Government has on deposit in this country was raised by floating bonds bought by American investors, and that they now owe the American investors approximately $75,000,000 which they intend to pay off in our depreciated currency, depreciated 40 cents on the dollar. They want to pay a $75,000,000 debt with $45,000,000. Now, should we on top of that give them this increase? If there is to be a profit on the transaction it should be given to the people of America. Our Government should get the benefit of this appreciation rather than their government.

There is another angle to this situation to which I draw attention. If our action in the matter of handling our currency instead of raising the price of gold to $34 an ounce had depreciated it to $10 an ounce, would they have paid us the difference? No. But now they are in the position of asking us to let them pay their indebtedness to us in our depreciated currency, but at the same time give them the appreciation on their money.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, as usual, the able Representative from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN], whose splendid service here is most valuable to the Nation, has said the last word on this resolution. He has made the identical speech that I intended to make.

There is not a single scintilla of justice in this proposition. If we pass this bill, it is going to cost the American taxpayers $23,000,000 in cash. That is what we are to vote on—a gift of $23,000,000. Why should our taxpayers back home be further burdened, when they are already overburdened, to make this gift of $23,000,000 in cash to our Philippine brethren?

I have been one of those who have stood by the Philippine representatives here on this floor and helped them make their fight for their independence. I have done everything that one man could do to help win their independence. The gentleman from Kentucky told you that they have not suffered any loss, they have received this money, loaned them by Americans, and it was worth 100 cents on the dollar; and when they pay the debt they are going to pay it in the depreciated currency and then receive a profit of $30,000,000. They are going to make $30,000,000 in profit, and we do not want to give them a double gift.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If we are going to deal in individual transactions, which confuses the real issue here, because this is a bookkeeping transaction——

Mr. BLANTON. It is going to cost us $23,000,000 in cash if we pass this bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It so happens that the Filipinos own seventeen or eighteen million dollars of our bonds that we are going to pay them off in depreciated currency.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Alabama is the fairest man I ever saw and I hope he will yield me an extra 2 minutes, having taken part of my time, when he controls the time for the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have promised all the time I have available.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want him to take up all of my time arguing in favor of his bill. I am against it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. So their people will get no more advantage than our people will.

Mr. BLANTON. That is problematical, and something that no man on earth knows. No one knows what is in the future so far as the valuation of gold is concerned, or the valuation of currency or anything else. It is something we do not know anything about. If we knew all about it we could get rich overnight. That is the something that keeps the big stock gamblers guessing every moment. It is something which is making millionaires overnight and paupers at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, we should not pass this resolution. This just shows what can happen when we have not anything else to do. The House of Representatives has finished its important business. We have passed the appropriation bills. We have passed the constructive measures of economic recovery sent us by the President, and we are ready to adjourn. We are waiting on the Senate.

We ought to adjourn the very first minute we can and go home and give the American people a breathing spell. [Applause.] Every minute that we stay here will result in the passage of bills of this kind and every time we pass something we take the good American tax money out of the Treasury of the United States and pay it to somebody other than the people out of whose pockets it came. If we do not stop this business soon, we might just as well do as the gentleman from Massachusetts stated one time. I refer to that great statesman who once served here from Massachusetts with us, Joseph Walsh. He said if we did not stop passing measures of this kind and taking money foolishly out of the Treasury, we might as well take the door in front of the Treasury off its hinges and invite everybody to come in and get what they want.

When are we going to adjourn? When are we going to stop all this foolishness? When are the leaders at the other end of this Capitol going to adjourn this Congress so that we may go home where we belong. Let us vote down this bill and kill it, and then let us finish our work and adjourn sine die next Saturday night. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield me a minute so that I may ask a question?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am sorry. I have all the time taken up.

Mr. DUNN. Did the gentleman make the statement that the President of the United States was back of this bill?

Mr. McDUFFIE. The President wrote a letter requesting it; so did the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Budget, the head of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and others. They have considered this matter.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert a table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the consent granted to me, I submit for the consideration of the House the collections and disbursements by States on account of the processing tax under the Agricultural Adjustment Act from July 1, 1933, down to and including April 30, 1934.

The figures as to the receipts have been furnished to me by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The figures as to payments to farmers were furnished to me by the Agricultural Department.

Expenses of administration for this period, $13,833,187.20.

I submit that this act has been highly discriminatory and has been handled by the Agricultural Department in a way to enrich one group of States to the detriment of another.

Such a course on such a colossal scale can result in nothing but disaster to the farmer. I hope that the act will soon be repealed and that this effort to ruin our farmers stopped.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman kindly yield me an additional minute?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield the gentleman from Texas an additional minute.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama said that the President wants this bill passed. If this were one of the measures wanted by the President as a part of his plans for economic recovery, I would without hesitation support it. But this is nothing in the world but a case where certain people are wanting to get $23,000,000 in cash out of the Treasury of the United States, which must be made good by collecting taxes from the American taxpayers. It is a case where they have importuned the President and he could not resist their urgent importunities. Oh, I know in just how many ways a President can be imposed on by friends. They besiege him with this request and with that request. They are his good friends. They argue, and they argue, and he cannot find it in his heart to turn them down. But when he finally gives in to their repeated importunities I imagine that in his mind must come the saving thought, "surely among the 435 Congressmen in the House of Representatives, fresh each 2 years from the people, there will be some who will resist this thing to a finish and stop it", and that must be a consoling thought.

If the great Woodrow Wilson could have been saved from his friends, it is my firm belief that he would be here now. Some of us here in this Congress must watch at all times to save our present great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, from his friends. By voting down and killing this bill we can save our President from his friends.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most unusual bill and should be defeated. There would be just as much reason for reimbursing Great Britain or France for any deposits which they had in the United States at the time of the passage of the gold bill last January as to reimburse the Philippine Islands for the 40 percent or thereabout of the supposed loss which was incurred by the passage of the bill lowering the gold content of the American dollar. By this bill we make a present to the Philippine Islands. If we have presents to give, why not consider the American people?

I had my say on January 24 about this gold bill, and everything I stated then I want to confirm at this time. It seems that this legislation came about through the request of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands to the Acting Secretary of Finance, to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the United States Treasury. I call attention again to the fact that the administration forced every American citizen who lived in the United States to turn over their gold to the Federal banks. They got only $20.67 per ounce. By this bill you propose to give the Philippines $35 per ounce for gold they did not have. All they had was a book account, and you say this must be considered the same as gold—an even worse discrimination against the American citizen but quite in keeping with other legislation you have passed at this session to help the foreigner rather than the American people.

There is no suggestion on the part of the administration to the American citizens who were compelled to turn over their gold at $20.67 an ounce that they will receive $35 an ounce sometime in the future. Oh, no; the American citizen is only a taxpayer. I recognize the fact, however, that we are buying gold, under the authority of the gold-bill edict, from foreign countries, some of which was shipped out of this country at $20.67 an ounce, and that this Government is now paying $35 an ounce for the gold. We are now the market for the world's gold at $35 an ounce.

It has been stated that this is a bookkeeping transaction; but, mark you, the taxpayers of the United States will be interested to know some of these days, when the whole situation is up for review, whether this was a bookkeeping entry or an outright gift. I say it is a gift. In the light of changing world events, there would be just as much reason for use to make a present to Great Britain or to France. Why not make a gift to the American instead?

In Paris today, because of the uncertainty of the German financial situation, which indicates they may have to revalue the mark, the Frenchmen are figuring out what their losses are going to be if they further devalue the mark. I imagine if we knew the truth of the situation, similar agencies in London and the United States are today trying to figure out what their losses are going to be by the downward revaluation of the mark. Are these countries going to force Germany to make good their losses?

As a result of our winning the Spanish War, we purchased the Philippine Islands and paid Spain $20,000,000. Then this action gave the Philippines good credit, and the banks and investment markets in this country were opened up and Philippine bonds were virtually accepted at some low rates, as our own bonds, and something over $75,000,000 worth are now owned in this country, and some of these bonds are held as security for public deposits by the United States Treasury.

A few days ago you gave the Philippines back to them—not to Spain but back to the Filipinos themselves.

And by this bill you are giving them a going-away present of over $23,000,000 of money that belongs to the American people. It is not fair to the American people.

To Spain (purchase price)	$20,000,000
From American investors (still due)	75,000,000
This bill (a gift)	23,000,000
Total	118,000,000

This is a pure gift to the Philippine Islands, to the detriment of every American citizen. It is a scandalous proposition when we consider the fact that this great Government of ours is penalizing every American citizen who held any gold, under the threat of sending him to jail or imposing a fine of $10,000. They even went so far in the administration of the gold bill as to institute suits against American citizens, through the Attorney General, to compel every one of them to turn over his gold to the Federal Reserve. The further effect was to take away 40 percent of all the equities of American citizens, and then they made a quick shift between the Treasury and the Federal Reserve, and the Treasury took, supposedly, the gold from the Federal Reserve banks which was held for the redemption of Federal Reserve contracts and their notes, and we then set up a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to use as he sees fit, without accounting to anyone, and over $200,000,000 of this amount has been now used and the American people are in ignorance of what has been done with it.

I submit to the Members of the Congress that we cannot afford to do a thing like this. You will answer to the American public, who have been forced to accept this imposition that has been put upon them under this gold-devaluation scheme.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I will read just a sentence or two from the majority report:

> This leaves a balance of $23,862,750.78, which, it is thought by the President and the above-named officials, represents the sum which should be credited to the Philippine government on the books of the Treasury in order to restore the gold value of the Philippine currency reserves as of January 31, 1934. When the gold content of the United States dollar was diminished, we took credit on our books for approximately $2,811,013,126.

Now, this money had to come from somewhere, and there is no reason why the United States citizen living in this country should be treated any differently from the Filipino.

From the minority views I desire to read a statement:

> In all, the Philippine government owes a bonded indebtedness of approximately $75,000,000, all of which is payable in dollars at the door of the Treasury of the United States, and practically all of these bonds being held by investors in the United States.

The Philippine people received a benefit as a result of the devaluation of the dollar by virtue of their indebtedness to individual investors in the United States, and for the life of me I cannot conceive of any reason why they should receive any different treatment than that accorded the citizens of the United States from whom was taken, even though it is said to be only a bookkeeping transaction, the greater portion of $2,811,013,126.

Mr. GUEVARA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GUEVARA. Does not the gentleman know that the American people have already benefited by the devaluation of the dollar by virtue of public improvements carried on through the P.W.A. and in other ways, all of which has been for the benefit of the American people?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, the problem which you and I confront as an incident to this legislation illustrates but one of the many evils growing out of the gold-devaluation policy or the policy of devaluing the gold dollar. I was opposed to that policy in the first place; but, as a matter of logic and straight thinking, no conscientious legislator can vote against this bill.

Let us see if, in a few words, I can state the proposition so that those who are listening and want to do the right thing on this bill will understand just what is at issue and what should be done.

In the first place, we cannot compare this situation with the situation which might exist between this Government and England or France, for this reason. We never passed any laws fixing the value of the currency of England or of France. We have never tied their hands on the value of their circulating medium——

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Let me complete my statement.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has referred to my statement.

Mr. BEEDY. I shall yield in a moment.

But on March 2, 1903, we established by law a unit of value for the Philippines. We stated in that law just how much gold the peso should contain and we stated that two pesos equaled one American dollar.

Then the next step we took that affects the value of their peso was to devalue our gold dollar. We thereby give ourselves more dollars. Theoretically we thereby made $2,800,000,000 profit, but we left the Philippines helpless, with the value of their medium fixed by this Congress. In other words, we contracted their currency by as much as we expanded our own.

Now, this is not the situation existing as between this country and France, and remember this bill does not deal with the relationship of this Government of ours to any citizen in America or any citizen in the Philippines. It is a question of what our Government, as result of having devalued its dollar, owes to the government of the Philippine Islands.

If our Government takes profit when we devalue our dollar, we should extend the same right to the Philippine government, whose peso is linked to our dollar by act of our own Congress.

Of course, there are a good many evils that follow from the devaluation of our gold dollar, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] makes an eloquent argument against the policy of his President. He shows some of the evils that are gradually coming to light and are inevitable as a result of the devaluation policy. The gentleman says that individual American citizens who bought Philippine bonds are going to lose money, and this is true, because their Government may now compel them to accept in payment of its bonds a dollar of less value than they promised to pay when the bonds were sold. Our Government may now compel American citizens to accept payment of our bonds in a dollar that is of less value than we agreed to pay them when we sold the bonds.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes.

Mr. BEEDY. There is, therefore, no logic, no grounds for a man to stand on in denial of the right of the Philippine government to demand the same profits that we ourselves take.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that by reason of the Presidential proclamation devaluing gold, the Philippine Islands will gain more than they have lost if we do not pay them this amount?

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman says the Philippine Islands. Is he talking about the Philippine government?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The Philippine government in repaying their bonded indebtedness will make more than they will lose by reason of the President's proclamation.

Mr. BEEDY. The Philippine government should make the same profit "out of thin air" that we have made by devaluing the American dollar.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I mean without the passage of this bill—they will make more than they will lose.

Mr. BEEDY. That is a matter of arithmetic—the gentleman can figure that out to his own satisfaction. Wherever the bonds come due in the Philippine Islands the holders of those bonds have got to take their loss. That is the inevitable result of the policy of the gentleman's party in the devaluation of the American dollar. I voted against the proposition and the gentleman from Kentucky voted for it. Let him take his medicine and stop whining.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I am not whining and I am taking my medicine.

Mr. BEEDY. Then why does the gentleman object to the bill?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Because, as I say, the Philippine Islands will make more out of this in paying their bonded indebtedness than they will lose by the devaluation. They will make money at both ends of the deal.

Mr. DONDERO. And what is true of the Philippine people is true of our own people.

Mr. BEEDY. Certainly. But let me put the problem in another way. On January 31, 1934, the Philippine Government had on deposit in this country $56,276,000 in pursuance of a law requiring deposits in our banks as basis for the circulating medium of the Philippines. Several times before the President issued the Executive order devaluing the gold dollar the Philippine Government requested that an amount of gold equaling the amount of their deposits of currency reserves be set aside by our Government as a basis for their circulating medium. But our Government persuaded the Philippine government not to insist upon such action, at the same time admitting that they had a perfect right to make such a demand.

Therefore, on January 31, 1934, we had $56,276,000 more of gold than we would have had if we had not avoided compliance with the requests of the Philippine government to earmark that amount of gold for them.

Thus when we computed our so-called "profit" on the devaluation of our gold dollar we realized profits on gold which in equity should have been earmarked for the Philippines. It is this excess profit on the $56,276,000 in question which we are now asked to credit to the Philippine Government. Who, in the light of these facts, can deny the justice of this bill? I certainly cannot.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that you are establishing a precedent that is going to have a great reaction.

I want to call your attention to the case of Panama, where the United States is trying to pay an obligation of some $450,000 owed to Panama in the new dollar, and Panama refuses and takes the matter to court. This important case, I understand, is now pending. Does not this bill dispose of this case? That is only one instance of the many complications as a result of the passage of the gold devaluation bill. I might call attention to the fact that there are many people abroad who are watching these moves; are we going to establish a precedent here now that will force the United States to pay in gold at $35 per ounce the people abroad, in continental Europe, who hold obligations, United States bonds, gold certificates, Federal Reserve notes—they are contracts, you know, and the holders of these contracts are watching the decision in the Panama case and what you are doing here today. I ask for the defeat of this unjust bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot refrain from giving my views, even though I have only two and a half minutes in which to express them. I was not in agreement with the policy of the administration in devaluing the gold dollar. I made a statement on the floor of the House predicting that we were going to get into much confusion as a result of that devaluation. We also had before our Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a statement made by an eminent economist who appeared before that committee, Mr. John Janney, and I read some of his words:

> Theoretically and superficially you have remedied the dislocated value of the dollar by such a law; practically and in effect you have merely added additional confusion, and you have established a principle that will destroy confidence in business, as in effect this legislation confiscates property and distributes wealth by legislative enactment. This is the very condition we are trying to remedy.

I think this statement and prediction of Mr. Janney is being vindicated by the very bill now before the House. His statement predicting the collapse of our credits and the failure of our banks has since been vindicated. I cannot understand why we have presented for such brief discussion these far-reaching and momentous questions. I feel and I believe we all should feel that the great principle involved in these monetary measures should be solved. If we solve the great problem of our money, if we establish the basis for confidence, which is stability, if we provide a sound and stable money system, we thereby will automatically solve all of these complexities at one and the same time.

We have not only this situation, as has been said here before today, but we are going to have probably a thousand different situations that are going to grow out of this mistaken monetary legislation. We are going to merely add to all of the confusion we talked about when we passed this bill. What will we do when Philippine bonds fall due which were bought with 23-grain gold dollars and will be paid with 14-grain gold dollars? If these dollars are the same, why this bill? If they are different, who will make good this difference to American investors in Philippine bonds?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman does not refer to the pending bill.

Mr. FIESINGER. I am referring to the general principle of the devaluation bill, and to the complexities that flow out of it, of which this proposition is a notable example. The contention is made here that we made a profit out of the evaluation. We made only a bookkeeping profit, and if by any chance future circumstances should develop that that paper profit vanishes into thin air, then we will have paid the Philippines $23,000,000 of the hard-earned money of the taxpayers of the United States.

When we see the cost to us, when we realize the economic consequences, which some day we will do, the consequences of this devaluation of our dollar, we will go back to specie payment on a stable gold-dollar basis. We will seek to restore the value of our exported products as measured in gold. We will see the necessity for this. Then, when that time comes, the less we have of such messy measures as this bill, the better for us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, this does not represent an additional burden upon the American people. Our Government has taken its profit of $2,800,000,000, but the insular government has lost and will continue to lose on its reserve fund. It is simply an effort to do justice, to do equity, to a ward or the wards of the United States Government. We should give our wards the same advantage relatively that we took for ourselves. Should the fears expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER] materialize, we could correct it by the simple process of legislation for readjustment, as we are trying to do now in this bill. Gentlemen have seen fit to say that the Filipino people have profited as a result of the Presidential proclamation. The Filipino individual, surrendering his gold, took no profit nor did his government profit as did the American Government by the revaluation; and having a different currency, which has been explained to you, they will sustain enormous losses because of a deflated dollar on which this currency is based by our law. For instance, the proclamation of the President will cost the Philippine government $10,000,000 in exchange on the Manila railroad bonds which are outstanding, payable in pounds, gilders, and Swiss francs. Is it right for this great Government that dictates the entire affairs of these people to fail to make them whole on losses sustained as a result of an act of our Government? As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] has correctly said, I think if you gentlemen could have been with the committee and heard the witnesses and heard their explanations of the equities of this bill, you would feel exactly as he feels and that this legislation should pass. Had the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] in his State a different currency from the rest of this country, fixed by this Congress, and a currency reserve fund deposited in dollars, but treated as gold, he would be here urging that the Congress do equity and make the people of Kentucky whole as to their currency reserves.

We, of course, have the same currency in every State and no State has a currency reserve fund. No other people have the same relationship to this Government as the Filipinos with reference to currency and there could be no such equitable claim as this from any other government. In addition to that, these people do two and a half million dollars' worth of business per month, on which the exchange, as a result of the devaluation of our dollar, amounts to many millions of dollars in the course of a year. Is it not the duty of this Government to aid them in a situation not of their own making?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman did not yield to me and I am sorry I have not the time to yield to him. I regret the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] is today joining the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] who can see no good apparently in any suggestion that might come from any President, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican. I regret very much the gentleman from Kentucky is today pitting his judgment against that of the President of the United States, of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the Director of the Budget, and all those who have recommended this legislation. We must assume that those gentlemen are not trying to throw away the taxpayers' money and we must likewise assume that they are trying to do plain, simple justice to a people entirely dependent upon this Government. I believe the American people desire to be at least fair and just in this matter in accord with the President's views.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am not surprised, if the gentleman will excuse me, to find the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] complaining about the policy of the administration, with reference to gold, but I am surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] who apparently applauds the President in his gold-standard policy, sees fit now to use the Republican argument in condemnation of that policy.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. He does not, of course, use the words of the Republicans, but actions sometimes speak louder than words, and in the argument he makes he simply underwrites the principal argument made by the Republicans against the Presidential proclamation in devaluing the dollar, and in his policies as to gold.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; for a question.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I resent the gentleman's linking me with the gentleman from Pennsylvania as objecting to the statements of all Presidents. The gentleman from Alabama said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] and myself can see no good in the statement of any President. The gentleman knows that that is not true. I have been one of the closest followers of the President in the House, and in every one of his measures I have stood by him. I think the gentleman is doing me an injustice.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I did not mean to say that the gentleman could not see any good in any statement of any President; but I do mean to say, and I regret, he could see no good in the statement the President at this time and on this particular measure has made, after assuming always to be a very loyal follower of President Roosevelt.

The minority report filed by the gentleman is ingenious, but its fallacy lies in the fact that in this bill we are dealing with a special fund of the Philippine government, and not with individual transactions or the payment of bond issues of either government.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Are we doing anything else than keeping faith with the Philippine government in passing this measure?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is correct; furthermore, I repeat this is not a question of the ownership of bonds or settling bond issues and individual transactions. This is a question of adjusting the currency reserves of the government of the Philippine people. These 14,000,000 people are under our flag. They are our wards, and in this instance we are trustees of their currency reserve funds.

Mr. McFADDEN and Mr. DINGELL rose.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McFADDEN. Inasmuch as the gentleman referred to me, I think he ought to yield to me.

Mr. McDUFFIE. In a moment I will yield to the well-known impeacher of Presidents.

I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I should like to ask the Chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs whether, as a matter of fact, it is not true that this is simply a matter of bookkeeping and allowing the proper share of the increase to the government of the Philippine Islands that we have assumed on the deflation of the dollar?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. Simply stated, here are people under our flag, and we are proposing in this bill to treat the currency reserve funds of the government of those people as we have done for ourselves in expanding the value of our own gold dollar. Let us remember that their fund was in dollars. Had it been in gold as they repeatedly asked, this bill would be unnecessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. My time has expired and I regret very much that I cannot yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN]. Of course, I know he disagrees with the gold policy of the administration. Let me here submit excerpts from the committee's report:

It was argued in the committee that our own citizens received no credit for the difference in value when their gold was called into the Treasury and redeemed in currency; that the Philippine government has outstanding bonds owned largely in the United States, which will be amortized in a devalued dollar; that if this bill becomes law, we will favor the Filipinos over our own people in that we are here proposing a credit to them on the books, as well as giving them the privilege of paying their obligations in a devaluated currency. If the Philippine monetary system were the same as ours and not a separate system interlocked by an act of Congress with that of the United States, such argument might be reasonable. The comparison, however, between citizens of our various States and the Filipino cannot apply, since our citizens as a whole will be benefited by the profit accruing to this Government, and these benefits will offset the personal loss that may be taken as a result of the proclamation.

In the case of the Filipino people, they have been forced to take the personal loss—their gold has been turned in just as was the gold of our own citizens—but no benefits will accrue to them or their government until the value of their gold reserve is reestablished by the Government of the United States. In the case of our own citizens, while the individual may not have been credited, nevertheless, the credit goes to the Federal Government, or the whole of the American people, each State, of course, having the same currency system as the Federal Government. It is quite certain that if any State had a separate monetary system tied in with ours by an act of the Federal Government the government of such a State would undoubtedly have the same rights and equities as we are seeking to establish by this bill.

The Philippine National Bank now owns Liberty bonds and other obligations of our Government amounting to approximately $17,000,000. Likewise, many of our securities are held by individual Filipinos. Those obligations will be paid, not in gold but in legal currency, which means that we will pay them with a devaluated dollar. It should also be stated that the insular government has outstanding bonds of the Manila Railroad payable in pounds, guilders, and Swiss francs. In amortizing these bonds in foreign currencies, due to the difference in exchange, as a result of the action of this Government in revaluing its money, a loss of approximately $10,000,000 will be sustained by the insular government. Surely no one can fail to see the inequity in a failure of our Government to make the insular government whole in a loss occasioned by our own action.

The currency-reserve funds of the Philippine government are by law held in two funds, namely, the gold-standard fund, the legal limits of which are not less than 15 percent nor more than 25 percent of all the money in circulation and available for circulation by the Philippine government; the treasury-certificate fund, which by law must consist of peso for peso, or $1 for every 2 pesos, for every Philippine treasury certificate issued or available for issue. Of the $56,276,056.92 Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States as of January 31, 1934, $19,112,253.42 pertained to the gold-standard fund and $37,163,803.50 to the treasury-certificate fund.

The experts of our Government have decided that the credit of $23,862,750.76 is just, equitable, and fair, and the committee feels that no great government can do less than what is proposed in this bill for its dependent people. It is in nowise suggested that any and all funds on deposit in this country to the credit of individuals and the insular government, over and above the funds actually held as currency reserve funds, should be enhanced in value by an act of Congress.

Coincident with the Independence Act, a refusal on the part of this Government to meet its moral obligation in readjusting the currency reserves of the insular government, the value of which is interlocked with our own monetary system, is inconceivable. Such refusal would be an omission unworthy of this great Government and of the Congress, on whom this responsibility now rests.

We have failed to keep faith in our Independence Act by putting an embargo on the second largest industry of the islands, which will likely be taken over by Japanese interests to the detriment of the American farmer and laborer. A failure to pass this measure would be another gross injustice, unworthy of the American people.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the gentleman would not yield to me, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky) there were—ayes 84 and noes 25.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I object to the vote on the ground that is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 189, nays 123, answered "present" 2, not voting 115, as follows:

A NEW ERA OF ART IN THE NEW DEAL

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, and Members of the House, the closing days of the Seventy-third Congress are upon us. In these strenuous hours and months since March 9, 1933, we have devoted our time to the relief of unemployment, economic recovery, and numerous measures of reconstruction. We have cooperated with our splendid President to set the wheels of the new deal in motion. Some of our problems are but partially solved but we have made notable progress. It is not my purpose at this time to review the comprehensive achievements of this Congress following the leadership of our great President because others of a more mature experience have done this more ably than I can. But it is my wish to point out a phase of the new deal that is worthy of special mention. In bringing up the subject of the Public Works art project, I desire not to detract from the pressing problems which confront us but merely to encourage an important movement of the new deal which has been given birth and which I think is so commendable as to be worthy of recording for the years to come.

In discussing the Public Works art projects, I desire to call your attention to the fact that along with the necessities of life such as food, clothing, and shelter, beauty is one of man's inherent desires. That beauty in music, sculpture, painting, writing, scenery, and in all its forms, has not only been a priceless gift in the life of every individual but that in some instances all we have left of a bygone civilization are but the footprints and fingermarks of the forgotten man and the work of its sculptors, its architects, or its poets. Only fragments of its glory gathered from its shattered and buried art remains. All else has been obliterated by time.

So I believe that one of the fine things that this administration has achieved is the help given to American art and American artists under the P.W.A. project. When the Government placed more than 3,000 artists on the pay roll and instructed them to produce works of art for the embellishment of public buildings, as it did during the past winter, the movement marked a new era in the history of the fine arts on the American continent. The maker of beautiful things was placed on an equal footing with the producer of industrial products. The artist was recognized as one of the factors that makes up the greatness of America.

Under the Public Works art project, of which Edward Bruce, a painter of distinction, is secretary, artists were employed at a small but living wage to produce the kind of work for which they were best fitted, and though it was described as a relief measure, it was not charity. When a collection of the productions of these artists was assembled in the Corcoran Art Gallery in Washington it was discovered that the Government had secured works of art worth many times the price paid. They were brought from all parts of the country, and I am happy to say that my own State and the Pacific coast produced artists of skill and inspiration second to none.

This unique program of the administration is helping a class of workers which was the first to feel the depression and will be the last to recover. Many of us, I am sure, wish to encourage this splendid program that has had such an auspicious beginning.

The pictures and sculpture produced under the Public Works art project are now adorning public buildings where formerly there were only bare walls, bringing a touch of beauty to relieve the eye and refresh the spirit. Many more works of art have been called for to embellish schools, libraries, hospitals, and other public buildings in every State of the Union. By this plan works of art are made available for the multitude which too often in the past have been monopolized by the privileged few.

Mr. Merle Armitage, regional director of this project at Los Angeles and who supervises the distribution of these works of art in Southern California, informs me that schools or other tax-supported institutions may receive works of art by applying for them. He further states the project has been such a great success that he does not see how the Government can give it up. That for an expenditure of less than $65,000 in Southern California, the Government has acquired nearly $500,000 worth of art, much of which is of a high class.

In continuing a program such as the Public Works art project, the Government is sponsoring the cultural as well as the industrial phases of our national life. During the World War, the services of artists in camouflage work was of great value as a measure of public safety and public-spirited American artists are continuously contributing volunteer posters and pictures for patriotic programs of our country. Artists have earned recognition.

It is no solution of the artist's problem to place him in other kinds of work. That merely adds to the overcrowding of other ranks of labor. It is a reasonable policy to employ the artists at producing the beautiful things for which they are fitted by talent and by training. It has been suggested that artists should be helped to find a market for their wares, just as help is given to other classes of commerce and trade. Just forget for a moment that an artist is an artist and think of him as one who takes raw materials and converts them into a commodity. The sculptor takes a piece of clay and produces a thing of beauty. The painter takes pigment and canvas and produces a lovely picture. If the clay were made into pots or if the canvas and paint were made into something utilitarian, the Department of Commerce would gladly help the producer find a market for his goods. It is equally reasonable for the Government to help rehabilitate the industry of taking raw materials and fashioning them into objects of beauty which redound to the welfare of all the people and add to the glory of America among the nations of the earth.

During the new era, with its shorter hours of labor, the problem of finding profitable use for leisure time is of paramount importance. There is no better way to employ leisure time than by the cultivation of the fine arts. As an avocation there is nothing superior to developing one's artistic talent. Now is the time for the American people to be encouraged in the pursuit of the arts. The handiwork of the artist is an individual expression that stands alone in this age of commercialism.

As a Californian, I was thrilled at the prominence given to the California artists in the exhibition held last month at the Corcoran Art Gallery, when the President and Mrs. Roosevelt selected paintings from my own State to be placed in the White House; and I was especially proud of the fact that the second in their choice of 32 art objects was a picture of San Pedro Harbor, which is a scenic spot close by my place of residence. Point Firmin and its sea-lashed rocks, which has tempted the skill of prominent artists, is also nearby.

At this point I wish to call attention to an appreciation of art that has been developed by numerous high schools of our country. One that is outstanding in my memory is in Gardena, Calif., in the congressional district I have the honor to represent. Gardena is a comfortable little city surrounded by vegetable, fruit, and dairy farms. Gardena takes special pride in its schools. For some years each graduating class of the high school makes a present of a painting to the school. The result is that the assembly room of the Gardena High School is adorned with a collection of pictures of which the entire community is rightfully proud. No visitor to this glorified assembly room can fail to feel the refinements and beauty of the environment. Those in charge of the recent art exhibits of the Public Works of Art Project of California have added numerous paintings to the California high-school collections. Thus art has taken deep root and exerts a delightful culture in many communities which by self-help have obtained these objects of refinement.

I might also add that at Avalon, Catalina Island (which is a work of art wrought by nature's hand), is a pottery plant that combines art with industry and converts the crude clay into many articles of beautiful design.

I have recently been interested in a movement now being fostered by Charlton L. Edholm, a painter of recognized ability and a friend of mine, who is promoting a series of small traveling art exhibits from Westchester County, N.Y. The idea is that traveling art exhibitions should be arranged, so that the people on the Atlantic coast should see the work of western artists and vice versa.

The ideas of this versatile gentleman, and those of hundreds of other individuals, can, if carried out, produce as great a cultural America as we have achieved an industrial and commercial America. For many years the people of Europe declared that America was great in all things, but lacking in art. This applies no longer. The new deal has sponsored a new era of art in America.

Because of the wide-spread interest in the Public Works art project, and those who are laboring for its success, and in behalf of many citizens of the United States, it is our desire to commend and encourage this cultural movement which has arisen out of the crisis in our economic life and its calamitous situations. It is to be hoped that the cultural side of America will be fostered and continued in the new deal, which promises the rehabilitation of the American home, assured employment, economic security, renewed hopes for the forgotten men and women, a more abundant life, and art for all.

TRIBUTE TO DR. REXFORD G. TUGWELL

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, the appearance of Dr. Rexford G. Tugwell, now Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, before the Senate Agriculture Committee to be questioned prior to taking action on his nomination by President Roosevelt to be Under Secretary of Agriculture, makes it fitting that I refer briefly to this brilliant and widely discussed young official.

Since I am not a Member of the Senate I have nothing to do with the matter of his confirmation, which is entirely within the scope of the Senate's authority. I am confident, of course, that the Senate will cooperate with the President, recognizing the wisdom of his action, and confirm the nomination of Professor Tugwell. I regret, moreover, that certain of the conservative wing of the Senate have objected to Dr. Tugwell's advancement as provided by the President. I am hoping that their objections are finally withdrawn, although if such should not be the case I am sure that the counsels of the progressive element will prevail and that Dr. Tugwell's selection will be approved by a decisive majority.

It seems to me a most encouraging sign of the times when a clean, sincere, high-minded progressive like Professor Tugwell—a scientist, an educator, and moreover, an able executive—occupies such a post in the Government. One of the finest things done by President Roosevelt has been to stand firmly by Dr. Tugwell instead of being swayed by loud-mouthed critics and faultfinders.

Personally, I do not know just what Dr. Tugwell regards as the ultimate form that an ideal government must take, and I doubt if he is flatly committed to any cut-and-dried philosophy. Rather, he is a man of the scientific type who refuses to be obstinately tied down to old customs and institutions. He knows that governments must learn new facts, just as human beings must learn them, and he is not in sympathy with the attitude assumed by some people that they know everything and there is no other knowledge in the universe for them to acquire.

Dr. Tugwell is certain about one point, and all fair-minded citizens should recognize it—that no government can do its duty unless it takes prompt and vigorous measures to guarantee prosperity to its citizens. Talk about "rugged individualism" and letting every man take care of himself is tragic and absurd when millions are unable to get jobs and food. In such an emergency there must be swift and energetic action. Even if mistakes are sometimes made, it is preferable to do something rather than to sit idly and prate in superior tones about the danger of a dole and the moral deterioration caused when the Government attempts to assure its citizens of the material needs of every human being.

I am one of an increasing number believing that far more progressive steps than yet have been taken must be taken in order to give our people prosperity and economic security. I take it that Dr. Tugwell favors trying moderate changes but has the intellectual honesty, courage and idealism candidly to urge going further if the welfare of the American people requires it.

We should be thankful that we have such a man in high office. The Nation needs more Dr. Tugwells.

SMUGGLED MERCHANDISE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution (H.J.Res. 322) to provide for the disposal of smuggled merchandise, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to require imported articles to be marked in order that smuggled merchandise may be identified, and for other purposes.

This bill was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], the ranking minority member of the committee, is agreeable to this action.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That where under existing law any forfeiture condemnation or abandonment of watches, watch movements, or parts thereof for violation of the customs laws is declared by the collector of customs, or any forfeiture is decreed by any court, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to place the same with the departments or bureaus of the Federal Government for experimental, scientific, or educational purposes, but not for sale or personal use; and in the event of such merchandise not being required or desired by the Federal Government, it shall be destroyed, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall find and determine that the sale thereof would not bring the merchandise into competition with similar products manufactured in the United States: Provided, That if such merchandise contains any recoverable precious metal or precious stones, such precious metal and/or precious stones shall be sold at public auction, or such metal or precious stones reclaimed to the profit of the United States only, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That the payment of compensation to informers as now provided by law shall, in the case of any merchandise which is placed with the Federal Government or is destroyed, be paid in the same manner and under the same conditions as now provided by law, except that such compensation shall be calculated on the basis of 25 percent of the dutiable value of such or similar merchandise as found by the United States appraiser, but such compensation shall not exceed $50,000 in any case.

SEC. 2. In addition to the powers now conferred upon him by law, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered, on and after July 1, 1934, to require each watch movement, complete or incomplete, imported into the United States, and its immediate casing, container, wrapping, and package, to be marked with the name of the foreign manufacturer and his consecutive number, or the name of the importer together with the manufacturer's consecutive number and name or trade mark, in such manner as he may by regulation prescribe.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "for violation of" and insert the word "under";

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, this measure has the unanimous support of the Committee on Ways and Means. It is purely an administrative measure, to bring about better protection against the smuggling of watch parts. It is well recognized that anything as small as watch parts can very easily be smuggled into the country. It has been carried on to a very great extent, much to the detriment of the manufacturers of watches and watch parts in the United States.

The statistics on page 2 of the committee report show the quantities that have been brought in, and also the fact that there are frequent occasions where advertisements are published showing these parts for sale.

There was a suggestion that each individual part should be marked by the manufacturer. That was contained in section 2 and was so impractical, many of the parts being so small that they could not be marked so as to be identified, that the committee saw fit to strike out section 2 of the bill.

I will say further, and in closing, that the manufacturers of watches in this country are entirely favorable to and are asking for this legislation. There has been such a tremendous amount of importation of watches and watch parts that the watch manufacturers of this country, where the best watches are made, are finding it more difficult to keep out of the red. Therefore, they are asking for this further effort to care for their interest.

I trust there will be no opposition to the prompt passage of the measure by the House.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Has the gentleman treated the situation that exists with reference to watches and watch parts which come into this country upon which the duty is not paid and are abandoned? The subcommittee was told that it amounted to a racket; that watches and watch parts would be shipped into this country and abandoned, the duty not paid, and then the consignment was sold at auction for much less than the amount of the duty.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Kentucky is correct; and it is a racket. These watch parts and movements are brought in, possibly the jewels taken out of the watches and the consignment admitted at a very much less rate of duty than they would be if the jewels were in place. It has been a continuous process for many years. When the last tax bill was under consideration this same subject was brought up before the Committee on Ways and Means and we had very extended hearings in an effort to protect the watch manufacturers of this country from the type of thing this bill seeks to correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Speaker, it was testified before our subcommittee that a consignment of watches and watch parts upon which the duty amounted to $240,000 was sold at auction for $95,000. In other words, they brought $145,000 less than the duty; and some of the watches and watch parts were purchased by the shippers of the goods.

Mr. TREADWAY. That fact appears in the committee report, which the gentlemen have helped prepare.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RETURN OF A SPEAKER'S MACE TO THE DOMINION OF CANADA

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 336, to authorize the return of a Speaker's mace to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any better explanation than that given in a communication from the President submitted just recently. I will read it:

During the War of 1812 the mace of the Parliament of Upper Canada, or Ontario, was taken by United States forces at the time of the Battle of York, April 27, 1813. That mace, which had been the symbol of legislative authority at York (now Toronto) since 1792, has been preserved in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis.

On July 4, 1934, there is to be unveiled in Toronto a memorial tablet erected by the United States Daughters of 1812 to the memory of General Pike and others of the United States forces who were killed in action. The mayor and council of Toronto are providing the site for the memorial.

The suggestion has been made that it would be a gracious act for the United States to return this historic mace to Canada at the time of the unveiling of the tablet.

The mace is a token of representative government, established at York nearly a century and a half ago. It symbolizes the orderly rule of such government in Canada, continuing from that day to this.

Since the agreement of 1817 the two countries have by common accord maintained no hostile armaments on either side of their boundary; and every passing year cements the peace and friendship between the peoples of Canada and the United States.

I heartily recommend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enactment of a joint resolution authorizing the return of the mace to the Canadian Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee think that all these little historic trinkets ought to be kept as mementoes of the occasions?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman can object to the bill, if he so desires.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. I am in favor of the resolution; and I think most of the Members are in favor of it; but has the gentleman any recollection of England ever uttering any word of expiation for setting flames to this Capitol in the War of 1812?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I have not.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Is it not true that for more than 100 years the two nations, Canada and the United States, have maintained friendly relations over a boundary line more than 3,000 miles in extent without a gun, without a fort, or without a suspicion?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DONDERO. And the return of this mace will be an act which will continue the friendly relations between the two Governments?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is stating exactly what I have read from the President's message.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute Senate Joint Resolution 221 for the House joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Authorizing the President to return the mace of the Parliament of upper Canada to the Canadian Government

Whereas the mace of the Parliament of upper Canada, or Ontario, has been the symbol of legislative authority at York (now Toronto) since 1792; and

Whereas the mace then in use was taken at the Battle of York, April 27, 1813, by the United States forces and since has been preserved in the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis; and

Whereas on July 4, 1934, there is to be unveiled in Toronto a memorial tablet erected by the United States Daughters of 1812 to the memory of General Pike and others of the United States forces who were killed in action: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to return said mace to the Canadian Government in token of the mutual friendship and good will existing between the people of the United States and those of Canada.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House joint resolution was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Joint Resolution No. 265, providing for the preparation and completion of plans for a comprehensive observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formulation of the Constitution of the United States, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a commission, to be known as the "United States Constitution Sesquicentennial Commission" (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") for the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formation of the Constitution, and to be composed of 18 commissioners, as follows: The President of the United States; the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, ex officio; 5 persons to be appointed by the President of the United States; 5 Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate; and 5 Representatives by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 2. The commissioners shall receive no compensation for their services but shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties out of the amount appropriated.

SEC. 3. The Commission shall select a chairman and appoint a director, who shall appoint, with the approval of the Commission, such assistants and subordinates as he deems necessary.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the commissioners, after promulgating to the American people an address relative to the reason of its creation and of its purpose, to prepare a plan or plans and a program for the adequate celebration of the sesquicentennial anniversary, and to give due and proper consideration to any plan or plans which may be submitted to them; and to take such steps as may be necessary in the coordination and correlation of plans prepared by State commissions, or by bodies created under appointment by the Governors of the respective States, and by representative civic bodies.

SEC. 5. That the Commission shall, on or before the 4th day of February 1935, make a report to the Congress, in order that enabling legislation may be enacted.

SEC. 6. That the Commission hereby created shall expire December 31, 1939.

SEC. 7. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $20,000 to be expended by the Commission for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

SEC. 8. That the Commission may receive from any source contributions to aid in carrying out the general purpose of this resolution, but the same shall be expended and accounted for in the same manner as any appropriation which may be made under authority of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 3, strike out all of lines 6 to 9, inclusive.

On page 3, line 10, strike out the figure "8" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "7."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] yield some of his time?

Mr. RANSLEY. Will the gentleman explain the bill, or shall we go on?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would prefer that the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] to explain the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill in which I have been interested from the time that I first became a Member of Congress. When I entered the Congress 7 years ago I introduced a resolution substantially the same as that now before the House for its consideration. I introduced it in each successive Congress, but the time of the proposed celebration was then so far distant that it seemed inopportune to bring it up at that time; therefore, I have waited until the present Congress, when, in association with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], we introduced the same resolution, but naturally under a different number because of the rule of this House that there cannot be two sponsors for any one resolution.

It seems to me unnecessary to dwell upon the value of having 3 years from now an appropriate celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of that great day in American history when the Constitutional Convention completed its task and submitted the Constitution to the people of the United States. Apart from any other consideration these commemorations are of great educational value.

I remember the first of these historic celebrations because as a boy I witnessed the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia in 1876, and I think it may be doubted whether any exposition gave a greater emphasis to the cultural growth of America as that modest exposition of 1876. It gave a new impetus to the patriotic spirit and the cultural growth of the American people. I participated in the one hundredth anniversary of the formulation of the Constitution in 1887, when Philadelphia was for nearly a week the host of the Nation. President Cleveland and his charming wife, the entire Supreme Court, the representatives of the diplomatic body, and the greater part of the American Congress met in Independence Square on September 17, 1887, to celebrate an event which next to the Declaration of Independence is probably the most important in our annals. The Declaration was an eloquent statement of the great objectives of a free government. The Constitution made them a reality. Therefore, for us to pass by unnoticed the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary would be a great mistake.

It is a debt we owe to the dead as a mere matter of gratitude. It is a duty we owe to the living and, above all, it is a greater duty that we owe to the unborn. We must transmit the heritage of constitutional liberty to those who are to follow us. To do so we must keep alive in the very soul of the American people the basic principles of the Constitution. They are not of a day, but for all time.

This bill does not propose, please observe, any definite plan or commit the Congress to any method of such celebration. It simply proposes that representatives appointed in the manner prescribed by the bill shall between now and February 1935 report to the Congress for its acceptance or for its rejection a plan for the adequate celebration of this important calendar day in our history. If the Congress, when their commission, if appointed, makes its report, is dissatisfied either with the character or the scope of the proposed celebration, the Congress may reject it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I am just as much in favor of commemorating such events as the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and, incidentally I may say that I hope some day soon, before we adjourn, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will get the permission of this House to incorporate all of his most excellent speeches on the subject of the Constitution of the United States into a House document, because he has delivered some of the ablest speeches I have ever heard on that subject, and such a document would be most valuable.

But when we have 3 years' time to make preparation for this celebration, we can just as well put this off to a succeeding Congress.

We are thinking at this time about men without jobs and women and little children starving to death. We are thinking about rehabilitating our country. Why not keep these not so important matters, that are not urgent, out of the Congress, and these resolutions can be taken up later, in the next session.

Mr. BECK. I appreciate the gentleman's gracious and generous reference to myself. Neither a man nor a nation can live by bread alone. There are things of the spirit as well as for the body, and it is an important thing that this country should consider a plan now for such a celebration. When the Commission's report is adopted or modified in the next Congress, only 2 years will remain for the necessary preparation for an adequate and Nation-wide celebration.

The time to appoint a planning commission is not too far distant. What ought to be planned is a Nation-wide celebration. It may be very simple. It may be restricted to a joint celebration in Washington or to some kind of a celebration amounting to a day or 2 days in Philadelphia, the city of the Constitution; but in every city, in every hamlet, and at every crossroad, when the time comes to commemorate the completion of 150 years of history, there ought to be a recognition by the American people of what is, after all, their greatest heritage and their greatest achievement in statecraft. Such it is by the common verdict of the world.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. BECK. Very well.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill carries, although stricken out by the Rules Committee, a provision for $20,000——

Mr. BECK. No; it carries nothing.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill as it went to the Rules Committee carried $20,000, and the committee struck it out because it did not have any jurisdiction.

Mr. BECK. It is stricken from the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is still in the bill legislatively, though stricken with lines drawn through it, and it would go to the Senate, where the appropriation could be restored and the amount increased. The gentleman knows that $20,000 will not be a drop in the bucket, but eventually there will be $100,000 or $200,000 appropriated before we get through with this proposition.

Mr. BECK. Very well.

Mr. BLANTON. Why start this great expense now—why not wait?

Mr. BECK. Very well; the House can decide the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not going to reach that point, because I am going to make a point of order against the bill and kill it just as soon as the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets through, and I think that will stop it, because the bill is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BECK. Our colleague from New York [Mr. BLOOM] and I, who have collaborated in the submission of the resolution to the Congress, have no such ambitious plan as contemplates any large expenditure of money; in fact, the resolution contains a provision allowing for the receipt of gifts, and it does not follow that the entire expense may not be assumed by private means.

However, I was about to say, when my friend from Texas asked me to yield, we are going through a series of profound constitutional changes. Some of them are good and some may not be so good; but, be that as it may, when we come out of this depression we will feel like the mariner to whom Daniel Webster referred in the beginning of his great speech against Hayne—we will feel the necessity, when the clouds of this depression have passed, to take a new reckoning and to see how far the elements have driven us from the true course charted by the Constitution—and at that time, when all the pressure of the depression is over, a celebration of this character, in which the American people will calmly consider what their Constitution was and how far it is necessary to adapt it to the changing conditions of the twentieth century, would be, in my judgment, of immeasurable value.

I have said so much, and I want to say just one personal word before I sit down, and if my time is up I hope I shall be given a few minutes extra time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 more minutes.

Mr. BECK. I want to say something of a very personal character.

When the debates were on with respect to additional appropriations for the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, I confess on the spur of the moment I said some things that were unfair and invidious, not intentionally unfair. I was losing sight of what was really a very notable celebration and a great public service, in critizing certain unimportant details. I missed the beauty of the forest in too meticulously examining some trees. Later when I came to write an additional chapter to a book that I had written, called "Our Wonderland of Bureaucracy", in an unfortunate moment, when I may not have been in a good humor, I did make some caustic observations in respect to certain minor details of the Washington Bicentennial. I paid full credit to the untiring zeal of the executive directors, but I criticized some details. This narrow criticism would have justified my generous colleague, Mr. BLOOM, in answering me in the same vein, because my references were partial, superficial, and misleading. However, he did not do it. His friendship stood the test, and he simply invited me to come up and see what the Bicentennial Commission had done in revivifying the knowledge of the American people in the immortal founder of the Republic, and I then, for the first time, became better acquainted with the scope, character, dignity, and the immeasurable value of that celebration, and I know we will all agree that its wonderful success is due, in very large measure, to the intelligent direction of it by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM]. [Applause.]

All this made me ashamed of what I had said, in good faith, but nevertheless upon insufficient information and possibly with a desire to be clever and witty. [Laughter.] While it was many months ago that my colleague from New York called attention to my unfair estimate that I had given of his long and uncompensated labor, I made up my mind then that the first time I could address the House when the subject was opportune I was going to publicly express my regret to the gentleman from New York for having superficially judged one of the most valuable educational works that this Congress ever entered upon and one that had a direction of such extraordinary energy and ability and such self-sacrificing devotion as that of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman know that the conduct of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration yielded the Government a profit of $1,000,000?

Mr. BECK. I did not know it. I knew it yielded a substantial profit, but it is enough to say that if it had cost the American people $1,000,000 it would have been money well spent in reviving in the minds of a people, who characteristically live in the day, who are forgetful of yesterday and oblivious of tomorrow, to make them think of the noblest character that ever lived in the tide of time. [Applause.]

Having thus said "peccavi"—I have sinned—in the words of Hamlet to Laertes, I simply want to say to my good friend from New York:

> Let my disclaiming from a purpos'd evil
> Free me so far in your most generous thoughts,
> That I have shot mine arrow o'er the house,
> And hurt my brother.

[Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, approving of everything the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] has said, I make the point of order against the bill that the Committee on Rules is without authority to report to the House such a bill. Eventually it would cause the Congress to appropriate several hundred thousand dollars, and we have the next 3 years to think about this celebration; hence, in this time of stress and depression, when men, women, and little children are suffering for food, I think it would be unwise for us to pass such legislation at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Texas insists on his point of order, candidly, I am not in a position to oppose it. But I should like to make a brief statement. It was the recollection of the Chairman of the Committee on Rules that when the resolution was reported out, it provided that points of order against the resolution would be waived. I find that that was not so. We had a great many rules coming out of the committee day after day, and unfortunately that was not included in this resolution. I guess I am responsible for it and accept the blame for that detail being omitted.

There is no opposition to the resolution, but if the gentleman from Texas insists, it will require only bringing in another rule waiving all points of order. The committee did provide for the striking out of the section of the resolution that carries the expense. If the gentleman from Texas insists on the point of order, I cannot successfully resist it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am under oath to perform my duty as my conscience dictates. I am trying to save the Treasury of the United States this money, for eventually this bill would cause several hundred thousand dollars to be appropriated, and I make the point of order against the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX). The language in section 7 of the bill carries an authorization for an appropriation and destroys the privilege of the resolution. The point of order is sustained.

AMEND THE INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION ACT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the House Resolution 383.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

House Resolution 383

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 2347, an act to amend the Inland Waterways Corporation Act, approved June 3, 1924, as amended. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does this relate to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE]?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We will help the gentleman out in the matter of time. We will not use any time on the rule on this side.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. I think we ought to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of the bill (S. 2347), to amend the Inland Waterways Corporation Act, approved June 3, 1934, as amended.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. O'CONNOR in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (e) of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to create the Inland Waterways Corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the Transportation Act, and for other purposes", approved June 3, 1924, as amended, is amended by striking out after the word "Warrior" the words "River or the Mississippi River", and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the words "Mississippi, Columbia, or Snake Rivers,".

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] is recognized for 15 minutes, and, without objection, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] will be recognized in opposition.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, this is a Senate bill introduced by Senator BORAH, of Idaho, and passed by the Senate on the 23d of January 1934. It gives to the Columbia and Snake Rivers the same privileges of the Inland Waterways Act as apply to the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers. Indeed, we claim the same consideration, we think with modesty, that has been given the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers. All there is in the bill is to incorporate language in the Inland Waterways Act so that it will read "Mississippi, Columbia, or Snake Rivers." As it is today, under the Transportation Act, before we can get water rates in our section of the country we have to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission, but under the Inland Waterways Act, by a certificate of public utility and necessity, we can get immediate action.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Why does the gentleman want a certificate of convenience and necessity, when we want competition?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. We have competition. This does not stifle competition at all. The rivers are open now to anybody who wants to use them.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But when you require a certificate of convenience and necessity, then somebody, in order to put another barge or a boat on, will have to go before the Commission and prove that there is a public need.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It does not stifle competition.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But the gentleman is making a blind statement.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I have only a few minutes here.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But the gentleman should make an accurate statement.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I decline to yield further, Mr. Chairman.

This measure would give to the farmers and producers of the Columbia and Snake Rivers districts the same privileges and benefits that are granted to the farmers and producers in the region served by the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers transportation lines. It undertakes nothing new. No new principles are involved. It means that if this provision benefits the people of the Mississippi and Warrior Basins, the same benefit should be extended to the people of the Columbia and the Snake. There is no purpose herein or as an aftermath hereto of setting up a Government-owned transportation system on the Columbia and the Snake.

There is no disposition here to stifle or repress competition but rather to make the water lines more effective in reaching the available crop.

There will be no difference in the matter of granting certificates of convenience and necessity. Legitimate needs will be covered in the Columbia-Snake Basin where transportation service for producers is offered the same as happens today in the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers service.

For instance, we have to pay 14 cents a bushel freight from Pendleton to Portland, a distance of only 200 miles—about the same rate that they have to pay from Minneapolis to New Orleans.

There is no local interest in the bill here.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Except Portland.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. No; no local interests are involved. This is to help all those farmers and producers in the interior of Washington, Idaho, and Oregon.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Are the railroad men in favor of this bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I do not know. I decline to yield further.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The bill is intended to give relief from oppressive railroad rates?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. That is correct.

Mr. CULKIN. And they are more particularly oppressive in that section of the country than in any other part of the United States?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. That is correct. In the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers there is competitive service on the water. We would have competitive service on the Columbia and Snake under the provisions of this minor amendment, the same as they do in the Mississippi Valley.

Navigation is now possible on the Columbia and the Snake a portion of the year a distance of about 450 miles. Of this total distance, about 150 miles is on the Snake, 200 miles on the Columbia down to the Willamette River at Vancouver, and 100 miles on the Columbia from Vancouver to the sea.

The 150-mile reach on the Snake cannot be navigated the year around, but we are working on the engineers to make this service continuous. We are making important improvements on the Columbia to make the navigation there much better. We are starting up boat and barge service that will help the producers. We need the power to make the railroads grant through or connecting rates in conjunction with these water lines. That is all we seek. That is all this bill proposes.

Approximately 12,000,000 tons of commodities are shipped out of the entire region tributary to the navigable portions of the Columbia and Snake Rivers. We figure that at least 2,000,000, maybe two and one-half million tons, may be moved on this waterway when we get conditions further improved, establish proper facilities, and get connections with the rail and truck carriers as you have the same in the Mississippi territory.

Our wheat farmers in the inland empire penetrated by the Columbia and the Snake seek a foreign or water-borne market for at least 75 percent of their total production. This means that from forty to sixty million bushels grown by our people must be brought to tidewater. We have some of the highest rates for hauling this wheat, grown by at least 6,000 farmers, to be found on the American Continent. Using these waterways is the only power we can get to force these rates down. This bill will help in our tremendous struggle to save our farmers, our interior lumber mills, and others from a pitiful struggle for existence.

I believe that this House should give us the benefit of this minor amendment to existing laws. It is intended to help the whole people and not any special interests. It is in keeping with every principle of the new deal and the new order of things wherein we are struggling to save the people.

I repeat, all this bill does is to extend to the Columbia and Snake Rivers the present privileges given to the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers as regards transportation facilities.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. How much would it cost to dredge the Snake River?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It will cost to improve the Columbia River from Celilo to the Snake River, a 7-foot channel, $400,000.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And when you come to the Snake River, how much will it cost to dredge it?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. They can operate boats now. It will cost $2,000,000, but we are not asking for that.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But as soon as you get this through, you will come and ask for the $2,000,000. This is just laying the foundation for that expenditure.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. This is laying a foundation to reduce freight rates for farmers and lumber producers in the interior of the country.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The times of the year they want to ship, the water is low.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. If by reducing these rates the producers use these rivers and their products go to river ports, it may militate against the gentleman's city. I hope so.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Outside of the city interests, I am speaking of the expenditure of Federal money. It will involve the expenditure of five or six million dollars.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Not at all. It will involve nothing.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The gentleman just admitted that it will cost $2,000,000 to dredge the Snake River. He is just laying the foundation for the $2,000,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. We are laying the foundation for nothing but the public good. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. TABER. I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, when this bill originally came up in the House on the Consent Calendar I opposed it. I do not have any interest in the part of the State from which the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN, comes, but I do know what the Inland Waterways Corporation has done in my section of the country. They operate on the Mississippi River. They started there some years ago, with the taxpayers' money, and they gave competition to the railroad companies in our section all up and down the Mississippi River. They took on cargoes at loss rates, and they shipped them down the river with the aid of underpaid barge labor, putting hundreds of railroad men out of work. The only argument for this bill seems to be that the freight rates now on carrying wheat to the Pacific seaboard are too high, and that if Government money will give competition to the railroads in that section the freight rates may be brought down. I cannot understand why the farmers of that section and the shippers have not appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission to bring their rates down to where they think they are fair rates; but I do not see why the Inland Waterways Corporation should get a certificate of convenience and necessity to lower freight rates. This would mean, in effect, a monopoly, because if any other waterway organization desires to compete, they will then have to likewise get a certificate of convenience, and you and I know they will not get it. They propose on these two rivers to allow the Inland Waterways Corporation to operate boats in competition with railroads and other forms of transportation, both land and water, financed by taxpayers' money. This Inland Waterways Corporation competes with private business that we are asked to subsidize to keep going by R.F.C. loans. We either should stop giving the railroads Government competition or stop loaning them money to keep them going after competition we create puts them on the rocks.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. That is not the purpose at all.

Mr. O'MALLEY. A certificate of convenience is a monopoly, because nobody else can get a certificate once a monopoly is entrenched. Why do we have to come here with a bill to give a corporation that has already cost the American people millions, that has been a downright failure, that has thrown hundreds of men out of work, a monopoly on the Snake and Columbia Rivers?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And did not the gentleman from Idaho state recently that they were actually operating on this river now; that they were actually hauling wheat?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I cannot say. The gentleman from Idaho did say that boats were hauling wheat on the river now; that is, on the lower river.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Two hundred and fifty miles, up around Lewiston, Idaho.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The Inland Waterways Corporation in our section has thrown out of employment skilled, decently salaried men, caused a part of our unemployment problem, with taxpayers' money, and they have not done anything for our section of the country except to drain the Great Lakes, which was the original excuse for authorizing the Corporation, not to help the farmer but to help the power companies get Lake Michigan water for their turbines.

I think this bill ought to be defeated.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been stopped three times in this House, twice on the Consent Calendar, as I recall it. Why? Because it has no merit whatsoever. It is simply another attempt to give some of the plutocratic corporations a monopoly, an opportunity to farm the farmers of the Northwest. That is what has been going on in this country. This is simply another indication of what we are doing in this House in the closing days of the session, fiddling while the farmers' houses are burning. I will tell you what the farmers of this country want, and they want it now, before this Congress adjourns. They want the enactment of the Frazier bill or a similar bill. They want a moratorium. They want to stop the running of the moneylenders' strangling cord for another year. I am prepared to prove there are 3,000 mortgage foreclosures on American farms every day, yet we sit here and debate a bill to give special privilege to a monopoly under the guise that it is going to help the farmers of the Northwest. The only thing that will help the farmers is higher prices. The only measure that will help my farmers is higher prices, and the suspension of foreclosures, the suspension of confiscation of their farms. We have not done a single thing to stop the money lenders' greed. We have not done a single thing to stop the money lenders' legalized burglary, and taking over of these splendid American farms from the real knights of nature's nobility in this country, the men who have gone down close to the soil, who have produced the food that you eat and the clothes that you wear. We sit here and devote this valuable time to the passing of such a bill when we refuse to do anything to stop the bloody plundering of the money lenders.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. No.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. TRUAX. I would rather have that from better authority than the candidate for Governor of the State of Oregon, whom I want elected in his State.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman does not understand a word of this bill.

Mr. TRUAX. I understand what the gentleman is trying to do.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman has not the slightest conception of it.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman is not fooling me on that.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman has never read it, and he does not know anything about it.

Mr. TRUAX. I know as much about it as the gentleman does about the economy bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] has expired.

Mr. TABER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] two or three questions about this bill. Is not the effect of this bill simply this: It permits any carrier by water, on the Snake or Columbia Rivers, to apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a certificate of convenience and necessity?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. They cannot do that now. There are no joint rates. This simply gives joint water-and-rail rates. It gives the shippers the benefit of the rail-and-water rates, which they can get now only through a very circuitous arrangement.

Mr. TABER. It would not be impossible for shippers to take the initiative under this bill and ask for the Interstate Commerce Commission to have control over these rates?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. They could do it but it would be a complicated matter.

Mr. TABER. It would be impossible for them to do so under this bill, would it not?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. No; this simplifies it.

Mr. TABER. It simply permits those who are engaged in the business of conducting a common-carrier service on these rivers to make applications. Shippers are not taken care of.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Shippers are taken care of by these reduced rates; that is the whole object of the bill.

Mr. TABER. But they cannot initiate anything.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It is to give the farmers more money for their wheat and the lumber mills more money for their lumber by giving them reduced freight rates.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. In what way? Will the gentleman name one way in which they will benefit?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Under the present Transportation Act they have to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under the pending bill they appeal directly to the Inland Waterways Corporation.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. For a certificate of public convenience and necessity; and once a common carrier on the river is granted such a certificate, it has a virtual monopoly, for no other line can operate on the river without a certificate of public convenience and necessity.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Others can get certificates, too.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Not unless they make a positive showing that the present holder of the certificate is unable to transport all the goods and wheat offered to it at all times of the year.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. As a matter of fact, they are using boats on the lower reaches of the river; wheat is being shipped out by water. We want to extend this service farther up the river.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Extend it into Idaho.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. We want to extend it many miles farther up the Colorado and Snake so wheat can be shipped down to Portland.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Because they will get cheaper rates; is that the idea?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. This is a bill to aid the farmers in eastern Oregon and eastern Washington. Those farmers are crying out for this relief.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The Government is now subsidizing the railroads. This will be a detriment to the railroads. We will be faced with the anomalous situation of the Government pouring millions of dollars into the railroads to keep them going, while at the same time the Government is spending other millions of dollars to improve navigation on the rivers to provide competition to the railroads.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. We want to take advantage of what God gave us—the Columbia River and the Snake River—and give the farmers the benefit of the reduced rates.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is the situation: There are at the present time boats operating on these rivers, carrying grain and other farm products. The only ones who are in a position to apply for Interstate Commerce Commission regulation of these boats on the rivers, if this bill is passed, would be those common carriers engaged in carrying merchandise and freight. The shipper would have no right to initiate that sort of thing.

Frankly, I cannot see where this fits into the situation. I would be glad to have the proponents of the bill tell the House where it does. I cannot see it.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I think I can make this proposition clear in a few minutes. This is a bill of Mr. White, one of the two Members from Idaho, Mr. White and Mr. Coffin. They are on the road to Idaho now, one never to return, and we are trying our best to pass this bill for them.

The only object in the bill is to afford an opportunity to make joint rates with trucks and barges on the Snake and Columbia Rivers so that the trucks may bring the wheat and freight to the river on a through joint water and truck rate.

No part of the United States has ever paid the high freight rates that this Snake and Columbia Rivers country is now paying. Freight rates in the inland empire have often been higher than the value of the wheat to the farmer. From my farm, 300 miles from tidewater, we are paying a freight rate today of almost 15 cents a bushel. Back in the days when we were shipping so much American wheat abroad we paid only 9 cents. The present rate is almost double that rate.

Now, we are trying to use the river. Boats operate from The Dalles to Portland, 100 miles, and we are just opening another link to Umatilla, which adds another 120 miles of navigation up the Columbia. The $400,000 that has been allotted by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors would blow out rocks and make the river navigable with a 7-foot channel to Lewiston, nearly 400 miles from tidewater. This bill will make it possible for the barge men on the river to make contracts with their truckmen to bring in wheat and freight from the country back from the river so that it could be shipped to tidewater on a through rate. The object is to bring freight rates down. No portion of the United States has ever paid the terrific high freight rates that that interior country has paid for 50 years. We want to force the freight rates down.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Admitting that the freight rates may be high and that the Interstate Commerce Commission has not given rates that are proper, if the railroads are put out of business they will come to Congress asking money to help them out.

Mr. PIERCE. That is another matter.

Mr. O'MALLEY. With one hand we give, while with the other hand we take.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIERMANN].

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, the United States is suffering at the present time from a surplus of transportation. It seems to me peculiar that this Congress is being asked year after year to subsidize additional methods of transportation in this country. This does not apply particularly to the Columbia River or to the Snake River, but it does apply to a large part of this inland waterway transportation system.

It is said that this is a cheaper kind of transportation. How is it cheaper? A railroad has to buy its right-of-way, generally speaking; it has to build and maintain its tracks; it has to pay taxes on that right-of-way. I venture to say that in the districts of nearly all gentlemen on this floor the railroads are the largest taxpayers.

For this inland water system, the so-called "cheap transportation method", the Government supplies the right-of-way, furnishes and maintains the tracks, and levies no tax for the use of that transportation system. Before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, it has been said again and again that the people advocating inland waterways transportation had declined to cooperate in working out some method of taxation on a tonnage basis which would repay the Government to a small degree for the service which it renders to the boats and for the purpose of amortizing these expenditures. These boats and barges want all of this service free of charge.

A few years ago the railroads of the United States employed 1,750,000 persons. Within the last few years they have gone down to less than 1,000,000. They have now, I believe, about 1,000,000 persons employed. One of the jobs that this Congress should seriously consider during the few remaining days of this session, or the next session, is legislation affecting these 1,750,000 railroad employees. Let us not stultify ourselves by adding more transportation systems in this country when those now existing cannot make their own way. Let us not create more water transportation systems to compete with transportation systems that are now not able to conduct their businesses on a paying basis for want of patronage.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have no particular interest in this bill, but it appears to me as though the Members do not understand it. All this bill does is to extend the effect of the Transportation Act of 1924 to the Columbia and the Snake Rivers, permitting the barge lines, whether they are owned or operated by the Government or individuals, to apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a certificate of necessity. Under this arrangement the Interstate Commerce Commission can order the rail and water carriers to make joint through rates which will accrue to the benefit of the shippers in that area. We have the same thing on the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers, and it is only fair to extend this privilege to these other two rivers.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is so simple that I am astonished at all the hubbub that has been raised. This is not a demand for the appropriation of a single dollar. It is simply an effort through this bill to have the same law that now applies to the Mississippi River applied to the Columbia and Snake Rivers, enabling those oppressed wheat farmers and lumber manufacturers in what we call the inland empire by the use of railroads, trucks, and barges to get greatly reduced freight rates and save that country.

There has been a lot of talk here about the improvement of these rivers ruining the railroads. It has been proven that every development of transportation on the Mississippi River has improved the condition of the railroads. The freight handled by these barges is a low-grade freight that the railroads do not get very much profit out of, but by the increased population and business of the territory, the freight which the railroads haul at a profit more than makes up the loss of hauling these heavy commodities.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the rate from the Mesaba Range to Cleveland, Ohio, and Pittsburgh, Pa., via the cheap transportation facilities by water was what made those two cities possible?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It certainly is.

Mr. CULKIN. And added greatly to the income of the railroads serving those two cities?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It is. It is the most short-sighted, narrow policy to talk about these barges and this cheap water transportation ruining the railroads. It does no such thing. It improves the railroads and improves the traffic of the railroads.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (e) of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to create the Inland Waterways Corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the Transportation Act, and for other purposes", approved June 3, 1924, as amended, is amended by striking out after the word "Warrior" the words "River or the Mississippi River" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the words "Mississippi, Columbia, or Snake Rivers,".

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I objected to this bill on two different occasions. At the time I objected I made my objection on a very general basis because of the feature of the issuance of a certificate of public convenience and necessity that this bill requires. I know the experience that we have had in the State of Washington with truck and bus lines with certificates of public convenience and necessity. They have caused us a great deal of trouble, and instead of creating competition they have actually created a monopoly of the worst kind.

Personally, coming from the city of Seattle, I am interested in grain shipments which go down the Snake River, then down the Columbia, and on to Portland. There is always competition between the cities of Seattle and Portland. But I do not direct my remarks to the particular local situation. This matter came up rather quickly this afternoon without notice and I did not have time to go to my office to get my notes.

There is at present a certain long portion of the Snake River which is not navigable except at times of high water, which is only 1 or 2 months of the year. The real underlying purpose of this bill is to lay a foundation to come to Congress a little later for an appropriation of two or three or five million dollars to dredge out this channel, just like the Chicago River, and this will be done under the same inland waterway act. That is the underlying purpose.

For the time being, so far as grain is concerned and so far as the rates down the Columbia River are concerned, the farmers obtain rates to Portland less than the railroads charge. This is a proposition to get up into Idaho and later on dredge that channel so they can go down to Portland all times of the year. As the river is now operated, there is real competition and any barge company or any boat company can go in there and say, "We will haul the grain of the farmers here for less money," but under this act you will provide that one company can come in and get a certificate of public convenience and necessity and before anyone else can go in there they will have to go through extensive and expensive hearings before commissions and before the courts and make a showing that there is a real, absolute, dire need upon the part of the farmers for another barge line or another boat line.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Then, under the present system of these boats going up and down the river, the benefit of low transportation only accrues to those industries and those farmers and those citizens who have access to the river itself.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. And also those that have an opportunity to put it on trucks or rail and haul it to the river.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. If this bill becomes a law, of course, the industries and farmers in the so-called "hinterland" back of the river will get their share of the benefits.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does the gentleman mean that the Government is going to dig canals into the hinterland so they can get to the river?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Absolutely not, because this bill puts the Snake and the Columbia Rivers under the Transportation Act and compels the making of joint water and rail rates and fixes the division of that revenue per ton proportionately between the two carriers.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But there is no one here who knows the circumstances who will not say that the rates upon the Columbia River, so far as barges are concerned, are lower than the railroad rates.

Mr. PIERCE. Does the gentleman know anything about those rates?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I do.

Mr. PIERCE. The rates of the barges on the river? I pay the rates down there myself.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Has the gentleman ever hauled on the river?

Mr. PIERCE. No; and nobody else from my country, because we cannot get down there.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Other people do, and they make the statement, without contradiction, that the rates are lower.

Mr. PIERCE. There are no rates on the Columbia River except on the lower river.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Everyone who has a barge can make whatever rates he wants, and that is the reason there are no blanket rates; but the rates are cheaper and the people ship on the river who are anywhere near it.

Mr. PIERCE. That shows the gentleman does not know anything about it.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I asked the gentleman the question, and it shows he does not know anything about it. I admit that I have a local interest—that is one reason for my being here—namely, to represent the First Congressional District of the State of Washington. But I am satisfied that if the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE], who sponsors this bill, were here and the membership of this House knew all the facts, that this bill would not pass as it will so easily today. I sorely regret being in a position to be compelled to resist in his absence on such a sad mission of duty.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

This is certainly a tempest in a teapot, especially when the celebrated man from Ohio who aspires to the Senate makes the talk he did here a few moments ago on a subject he knows nothing about.

Several who have spoken are not particularly interested in any cheap rates for the farmers or the lumberman to bring their freight down the Columbia and down the Snake Rivers. The Snake River is not navigable now. The Columbia River is navigable with barges from Portland to The Dalles, 100 miles. They are attempting now to put on a barge line this year for 100 miles beyond The Dalles to Umatilla Landing.

The big body of the wheat raised in the Pacific Northwest, that part of the United States that really has a crop this year, raising nearly 100,000,000 bushels in a good year, is raised further up the river than The Dalles, although a part of it is raised at The Dalles. This is an attempt to give us a lower freight rate. We want competing rates on this freight, the railroads and the trucks and barges.

Near Lewiston there is one of the biggest forests of ponderosa pine in the United States. Freight rates are so high that it is not profitable to cut the ripe trees.

If a joint freight rate could be made for trucks and barges, and this river opened up by dredging and blowing out rock at a cost of $400,000, according to the engineers, we believe it would reduce freight at least to the rate charged before the World War.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. All you aim to accomplish is to reduce the rate on wheat so as to help the farmer secure a low rate, as well as manufactured lumber?

Mr. PIERCE. Absolutely. We have proved time and again in the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Commission that we have the highest freight rates in the United States. We pay three times as much as they do in Canada over a similar distance and six times as much as they pay in many places in Missouri and Iowa. We are simply owned and held up by the bondholders of the railroad.

Mr. PEYSER. You want the same privilege on the Snake and Columbia Rivers as is enjoyed by the Warrior and Mississippi Rivers?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this valuable timber that would come down, if this plan were carried out, owned by private individuals?

Mr. PIERCE. Most of it is forest reserves owned by the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it more valuable to the Government in the state it now is or as lumber?

Mr. PIERCE. The forest reserves have much ripe timber, and that ripe timber should be cut out before it is killed by beetles and lost.

Mr. BLANTON. I am for the sane development of every water course in the United States. Our people are benefited by it.

Mr. PIERCE. That is just what we want.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "Mississippi" in line 2, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to use my 5 minutes to talk about what I consider one of the greatest criminal follies that has been perpetrated on the American people in the last few months. This bill refers to the Columbia River and the Snake River. I refer to the upper Mississippi from St. Louis to St. Paul. Along this stretch of the Mississippi River we have a railroad on each side. One of these railroads is in the hands of a receiver and the other is barely making its way. We have theoretically a 6-foot channel in the upper Mississippi, on which to haul wheat and corn and other farm products, to give low freight rates to the farmer. I never knew of a farmer in my district who shipped a bushel of wheat or a pound of pork or a head of cattle on the upper Mississippi 6-foot channel.

Mr. PIERCE. But has not it affected the freight rate? You do not have to ship over the line. The railroads cut their rate.

Mr. BIERMANN. The farmers do not say so.

Mr. PIERCE. Why, sure. As quick as we commenced to ship wheat from The Dalles by boat, the railroad lines cut their rates almost half in two.

Mr. BIERMANN. The combined rate by rail and water today on the upper Mississippi River is 80 percent of the rail rate, so that the farmer theoretically saves 20 percent and he does not use it.

Mr. PIERCE. Sure, because the railroads cut theirs down.

Mr. BIERMANN. But the combined rate is still 20 percent under what the railroads charge, and the farmer does not use it.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. We have been talking about reducing the freight and transportation rates for 10 years to relieve the farmer, and he has gone deeper into the hole every year. I do not think this difference of 8 cents a bushel is going to make or break the farmer, but it will probably give a monopoly to a private corporation on those rivers.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman know that the freight rate from Puget Sound to Des Moines for 1,000 feet of lumber is $22.44, and that the freight rate from New Orleans to Des Moines, Iowa, a third of the distance, is only 75 cents per thousand as against $22.44?

Mr. BIERMANN. I am not aware of that, but the second low rate the gentleman speaks of can be very largely by water.

Mr. LLOYD. The reason for that is water competition on the Mississippi River.

Mr. PIERCE. And that is what we want.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIERMANN. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. I am going to take the liberty of putting to the gentleman a hypothetical question: Assuming that unless these people in this locality, numbering about 6,000, get relief from these so-called "oppressive" freight rates, that they will have to move out of the country, then is not the gentleman in favor of this relief?

Mr. BIERMANN. But I am not talking about the Columbia and the Snake Rivers.

Mr. CULKIN. I know; but is not that true? Assuming the rates are so oppressive that these farmers must move out and make homes elsewhere, should not they have relief under this bill, despite any demagogy that is allowed here?

Mr. BIERMANN. But I want to say a word in regard to the upper Mississippi River Channel. About 35 years ago the mental ancestors of the people who now propose a 9-foot channel, proposed a 4-foot channel, and the Government dumped money into the Mississippi for the 4-foot channel. It was not a success. They later proposed a 6-foot channel, which we are now supposed to have, and they dumped other millions of money into that. The 6-foot channel is not a success, and now they propose a 9-foot channel. At the last session of Congress the Rivers and Harbors Committee considered the proposition of spending $11,600,000 on the 9-foot channel and did not even report it out, but Mr. Ickes puts thirty-three and one-half million dollars as an allotment in that project for which Congress had declined to appropriate $11,600,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the gentleman offering this amendment as a pro forma amendment?

Mr. BIERMANN. I offered the amendment as a pro forma amendment and now ask to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Commitee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'CONNOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2347, and that under House Resolution 382 he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ZIONCHECK and Mr. TRUAX) there were—ayes 61, noes 19.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present and challenge the vote on that account.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. This is an automatic call. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 220, nays 93, not voting 116.

LEA of California; CROSSER of Ohio; MILLIGAN, of Missouri; HOLMES, of Massachusetts; and REECE, of Tennessee, are engaged in hearings on the railroad pension bill, and for that reason they did not appear and answer to their names.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The doors were opened.

LEGISLATION OF THE SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, our Nation has been financially sick for some time and our best physicians have been unable to fully diagnose the case or prescribe proper treatment for quick recovery.

There are many theories as to the cause of our trouble. Some say our Nation's illness was brought about by poor management by those in charge of the legislative and executive branches of government during the 12 years immediately prior to the election of President Roosevelt. Others say high protective-tariff rates, loss of foreign markets for our farm and manufactured products, excessive gambling in stocks and securities, scarcity of money in circulation, and so forth.

For our illness, generally known as the "depression", numerous remedies have been suggested, many remedial laws enacted by Congress, and billions of dollars appropriated for various purposes. The farmers, laborers, and industries have financially suffered; but the remedies proposed and put into operation have brought about much improvement, and it is generally believed our great country will soon be normal.

I represent 12 of the leading agricultural counties of middle Tennessee. Up to a few years ago the people living in these counties were prosperous, happy, and contented with their financial and economic conditions. The burdens falling upon their shoulders, such as high taxes, excessive rates of interest on borrowed money, low prices for their farm products and lands, largely due to 12 years of Republican misrule, cast a shadow of despair which at times was hard to endure. The farmers of my district, however, are courageous, determined, and hopeful, and are now rejoicing that the legislative machinery set in motion by our fearless President and the United States Congress for their relief has brought a ray of sunshine and renewed hope for a better day.

Presumably there is as much money in the country now as ever before, but it is not in circulation. Statistics show that 5 percent of the people own 95 percent of the wealth of the country. This unequal division of wealth is unfair and unjust. The money of the country has evidently drifted from the rural sections into the coffers of the big bankers and corporations. Money is power. Therefore, too much power through our former system and control of governmental affairs has been placed in the hands of the few, which has been used to crush and destroy the many.

When money is plentiful farm products and wages are higher, when scarce everything is low; therefore, laws should and will be enacted by Congress, in addition to the many beneficial acts of the Seventy-third Congress, that will cause a just and equitable proportion of swollen fortunes, hoarded money, and securities to flow back into the hands of the masses.

The economic upheaval of the country brought in its wake many heartaches to the farmers, laborers, and small business men. The financial burdens to these three groups have been almost unbearable. Without experience no one can correctly visualize their former condition. The market of the farmer had been taken away, his home mortgaged, and he had been forced to sell his farm products below cost of production, and in many instances his fertile acres had been taken away from him by the money changers turning him out and placing him in the great army of the unemployed. It follows, as does the night the day, that when the farmers are broke the manufacturers, merchants, laborers, and professional men likewise, sooner or later, go to the wall. Our chief concern, therefore, as Members of Congress should be to return the farmer to his former prosperity in the economic structure of our Government, because on his prosperity the whole world depends.

During the Seventy-third Congress I have given much time and thought to measures designed to better the financial condition of the farmer. I have consulted with and taken the advice of leading representatives of farm organizations and friends who were in a position to give beneficial information, and it has been a pleasure to join hands with other friends of the farmers in the Seventy-third Congress to give them more financial relief than any other Congress in the history of the Nation. But in my zeal to lend a helping hand to the farmers and laboring men of our country, I do not want it understood that I am against corporations and men of wealth who use their money for honest and legitimate purposes and for the promotion and best interests of mankind. Wealthy men who use their money for the promotion of railroads and other transportation facilities, build factories for the employment of idle labor, schools and colleges to educate the coming generations, do a wonderful work for their country and are entitled to a fair return on their investments. The farmer could not well succeed without means of transportation to carry his products to the various markets of the world. The laborer could not long survive in the large cities without factories to give him and his family employment and schools and colleges to educate his children. As Representatives I feel it is our duty to enact laws that will give all classes a square deal in their efforts to meet and comply with the many responsibilities of life.

Reports from various parts of the country indicate the President's program for relief is producing good results, but, in my opinion, we will not have permanent prosperity until we in some way open up foreign markets for farm and factory products. The Tariff Act which gives the President power to make reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations will, no doubt, bring about the desired results.

Some 20 or 30 important measures were recommended by President Roosevelt and enacted into law by the Seventy-third Congress for the purpose of giving immediate relief and restoring permanent prosperity, a few of which I will mention briefly.

THE FARM MORTGAGE ACT

The purposes of this act were to create emergency legislation authorizing the President to set up a farm-credit association. Under this act the President has consolidated the activities of the Federal Farm Board and various other boards and bureaus set up by preceding administrations in their futile efforts to deal with the farm crisis and save the agricultural industry from bankruptcy. Authority was also conferred upon the President to expand credit, stimulate prices of farm products, increase the currency in circulation, and to take such other steps as might be deemed necessary to restore agriculture to a basis of prosperity and end the orgy of bankruptcy that has swept away the homes and other property of millions of farm families. The sum of $200,000,000 was provided for additional farm credits, and more far-reaching in its effect will be the $2,000,000,000 in bonds, guaranteed by the Government as to both principal and interest, with which farm mortgages may be refinanced at the low interest rate of 4½ percent to the farm owner, who is also given 15 years' time in which to amortize the mortgage. Although this act will give relief to thousands of distressed farmers, it has not and will not take care of all who may need help.

I supported this measure, but at the same time felt the interest rate on loans was entirely too high. I saw no reason why the Government should loan money to the big bankers, the railroads, and other big corporations for nothing, or a very low rate of interest, and deny the farmer, who needed help, the same accommodation.

THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY ACT

This act is for the purpose of further developing the great project begun by our beloved Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson, which for the past 12 years has been permitted to go to waste, and provides for the completion of Cove Creek

Dam in Anderson County, for the purpose of reducing fertilizer costs to the farmer and furnishing a yardstick for determining a fair and reasonable rate for electricty, bringing cheaper power to consumers of electricity throughout the entire country, and marks the dawn of a new day of electrification in rural as well as in urban localities.

I have advocated and worked for cheaper electric-power rates for the past 12 years. Many of you, I am sure, will recall my two speeches in Congress on the development of Muscle Shoals. Nature has given us great power sites on the Tennessee and other rivers of the Nation for the use and benefit of all the people and not to enrich a special few. Let us have cheap electric-power rates so that every home, be it ever so humble, may be made bright and cheerful.

In communities where electricity has been furnished by the Tennessee Valley Authority the price has been reduced to the consumer to one-third of former prices. In addition to dams now being constructed on the upper Tennessee I have been informed by the Tennessee Valley Authority that work will soon begin on the construction of dams on the lower Tennessee River at Picwick Landing and Aurora, Ky. This will be the beginning of a new era in this section of Tennessee and Kentucky. The construction of these two dams and the clearing of thousands of acres of land that will be overflowed will give lucrative employment to hundreds now out of work. A cheaper rate for electricty will lighten some of the drudgeries of home life and lift from the shoulders of the farmer and his wife some of the burdens they are carrying as they wend their way along the pathway of life. Let us have cheaper power so that we may have cheaper fertilizer to make richer and more productive our many acres of farm lands. The development of Muscle Shoals will not only give employment and markets to our citizens but will also utilize our fine phosphate and iron-ore deposits in many of the counties of my district and elsewhere.

The bill providing for the Muscle Shoals development was considered and recommended for passage by the Military Affairs Committee of which I am a member, and I am proud of the part I played in bringing this wonderful project to the direct relief of the people of my district and of the Nation.

INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY AND PUBLIC WORKS

As defined by President Roosevelt, the purposes of this act are (1) to obtain wide employment, (2) to shorten the working week, (3) to pay decent wages for the shorter week, (4) to prevent unfair competition, and (5) to prevent disastrous overproduction.

The main purpose of this act is to afford industry an opportunity to regulate itself through trade associations which it will set up, the Government dealing with each industry through the association organized within itself. This measure is defined as a partnership with industry rather than a measure to control industry and provides for a bond issue of $3,300,000,000 to be retired at the rate of $220,000,000 annually. It is estimated that this act has put over 3,000,000 unemployed back to work.

SECURITIES ACT

This act provides for Federal supervision of interstate traffic in investment securities. It is designed to protect the public against the flotation of stocks, bonds, or other securities of doubtful value, the sale of which in recent years has cost the public millions of dollars.

The act was not intended to serve the purposes of a blue-sky law or to determine what securities may be sold, but requires the company issuing the securities to file a statement of its condition when the securities are issued and to disclose how the proceeds of the sale are to be expended.

It also requires the prospectus used in connection with the sale of the securities to be based upon the registration statement of the company, giving to the public a correct statement of its condition, investment policy, practical and corporate set-up, and provides that those selling the securities can be sued for the recovery of any losses on stock bought from the company through misrepresentation or false statements of any kind. The act does not operate so as to inflict penalties on any corporation selling stock in an honorable manner and applies only to those using dishonorable and unfair means to sell to an unsuspecting public.

In view of the fact that the liability of the officers and directors of corporations has heretofore been restricted so that damages could not be recovered from a misrepresentation of facts, this law will have a wholesome effect on the future sale of securities and afford a much-needed protection to the public.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE ACT

This act is known as the "Federal Securities Exchange Act of 1934."

President Roosevelt in his message to Congress in March 1933, proposing legislation for Federal supervision of national traffic in investment securities, said:

> This is but one step in our broad purpose of protecting investors and depositors. It should be followed by legislation relating to the better supervision of the purchase and sale of all property dealt with on exchanges.

After the passage of the Securities Act of May 27, 1933, he said:

> This Congress has performed a useful service in regulating the investment business on the part of financial houses and in protecting the investing public in its acquisition of securities.

While exchanges for dealing in securities and commodities are of infinite value to our commercial and agricultural life, it should be our national policy to restrict as far as possible their use for purely speculative operations.

Excessive speculation has brought social and economic evils which have affected the security and prosperity of the entire country. During the boom period a vast and unhealthy volume of credit was put into the securities market to the deprivation of agriculture, commerce, and industry, which inflated security prices far above their real value. This feverish speculation accelerated the process of inflation until October 1929, when the present depression began.

The market value of all stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange slumped from $89,000,000,000 on September 1, 1929, to $15,000,000,000 on July 1, 1932.

The act forbids the use of the mails or instrumentalities of interstate commerce to any securities exchange which is not registered with the Commission as a national securities exchange.

The act further aims to protect the public by preventing officers, directors, and principal stockholders of a corporation from speculating in the stock on the basis of information not available to others.

It is not intended by the bill to give the administrative authority the power to interfere with the management of corporations.

The bill provides that securities traded in upon exchanges must be registered with the Commission, and that a condition of such registration shall be the furnishing of complete information relative to the financial condition of the issue, which information must be kept up to date by adequate periodic reports.

The Commission is given full discretion to exempt securities from the operation of many sections of the act and to require that corporate reports shall contain such information as it deems necessary and appropriate to protect the public interest and investors.

LOANS TO INDUSTRY

At the present session the House passed a bill authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to any industrial or commercial business established prior to January 1, 1934, when credit at prevailing bank rates for loans of such type is not available at banks or the Federal Reserve bank of the district of the applicant, not to exceed $300,000,000 in the aggregate amount, which shall have maturities not exceeding 5 years. The aggregate amount of loans to any one borrower shall not exceed $100,000 and the authority to make such loans ends January 1, 1935.

There are many industries now seeking loans that are in a distressed condition and need assistance. Many are of medium-sized type and are risks that commercial banks cannot with propriety take, though ultimately good. These loans will stimulate business, provide for additional employment, and will render material aid in the recovery program.

The act does not call for any additional appropriation, as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is expected to allocate funds for this purpose that it may save from other items in its budget and from repayments over and above those estimated.

This appropriation, plus the capital loans authorized under section 12 of the act to be made by the Federal Reserve banks, is expected to be sufficient to care for the need for credits for capital funds supplementary to the usual or normal bank credits.

THE ECONOMY ACT

The passage of this act, plus the reorganization of many departments of the Government, was expected to save about $1,000,000,000 during the current fiscal year. It temporarily reduced the salaries of Government employees 15 percent, but power was given the President to restore parts of the 15-percent cut as the prices of farm commodities and cost of living increased.

THE SOLDIER BONUS

Before I was elected, by act of Congress a soldier bonus was provided for, payable a few years in the future. I supported a bill for the immediate payment of this obligation. It created no new debt, but brought relief to thousands by paying a debt rather than by creating one, and, without extra cost, some relief has also been provided for worthy veterans. The payment of the bonus will not only benefit the soldiers but all the people, because it will put more money in circulation to stimulate the farmers and business enterprises of all kinds, especially in the rural sections.

VETERAN LEGISLATION

I favor a liberal compensation to the ex-service men who have been the Nation's defenders. We owe them a great debt of gratitude. The sick and wounded should be given proper treatment and medical attention in our hospitals.

I have supported legislation favorable to the ex-service men, and will continue to do so, especially those wounded in battle or suffering from disease as a result of exposure in service.

RESTORATION OF SALARIES

While considering H.R. 6663, an act making appropriations for executive offices and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, and so forth, and restoring part of the pay cut to Government employees, Representative DOWELL offered the following amendment:

That no part of the appropriation carried in this act, or any other general appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, shall be used in payment in excess of 85 percent of any salary or compensation of any officer or employee of the Government (except judicial officers) where such salary or compensation is in excess of $6,000.

I voted for this amendment because I felt then, and I feel now, that Government officials receiving more than $6,000 per annum could afford to wait until the financial condition of the country improves before having their former salaries restored.

SCHOOLS AND ROADS

Schools and roads go hand in hand with the progress and development of our Nation. I have advocated and voted for appropriations giving Federal aid to our colleges and schools and our Federal, State, and county systems of roads. Federal aid has heretofore been given to certain classes of roads, more for the benefit of tourists and pleasure-seekers than any other class. The time has come when more attention should be given to strictly rural roads that are used by rural-route carriers and farmers in transporting their farm products.

No body of men and women has ever worked harder to bring success out of failure than the Members of the Seventy-third Congress. Regardless of party affiliations, they have, in the main, stood together like soldiers and faithfully followed the leadership of our President. This great Nation belongs to us all and it is our duty as good citizens, regardless of our station in life and political opinions, to pull together for better and brighter days. If we will do this we will soon fully emerge from the most disastrous depression into the most prosperous era of our entire history.

LIFE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules has reported a rule for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9178) to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia. By agreement with the minority members of the Committee on Rules, I think it would be entirely agreeable, in order to save time, to request unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill under the terms provided in the rule. This matter ought not take very long. As I understand, there is no opposition to the bill itself. It is a matter that has been given very careful consideration for 3 or 4 years by the committee in charge of it. It is a matter of very great importance, I understand, for the protection of policyholders and other insured people in the District of Columbia against fake companies and fake agents. I, therefore, submit this unanimous-consent request, that the bill, H.R. 9178, may be considered in the House under the terms provided in the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, on Saturday when this bill was called up I objected to the unanimous consent because I was not acquainted with the text of the bill, which contained 133 pages. Since then I have made some inquiries, and I find the legislation is proper, and in fact should be enacted into law. Therefore, I join with the gentleman from Alabama in his request.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that he has studied this 133 pages of legislation?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Far be it from me to intimate that fact. I am confident, however, the bill is proper to pass.

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is the purpose to consider the bill today?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is. Under the terms of the rule, if the gentleman is not familiar with it, it provides that there shall be 30 minutes' general debate, and the time shall be equally divided between and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member. The bill should then be considered as having been read for amendment. That is because of its great length. Amendments to all parts of the bill shall thereupon be in order.

Mr. TRUAX. I will say there were some of us who objected to the bill on that ground, that it was so long, and we wanted to see it. Personally, I have not had an opportunity, and I would like to read it tonight if the gentleman would call it up tomorrow morning.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, we have a great many more matters that we want to take up. There are a great many rules that I am being besieged to call up. The Speaker has a number of bills on his desk for which he intends to recognize Members to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. TRUAX. I understand the gentleman's position perfectly, and I am in sympathy with him, but I personally want to study this bill. At least, I want to read it before I vote upon it. I will have to object if the gentleman insists on his request.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 397 and ask its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9178, a bill to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment and amendments to all parts of the bill shall thereupon be in order. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9178) to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 9178, the life insurance bill, with Mr. SROVICH in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, in the District of Columbia all the law pertaining to life-insurance companies is included in 13 sections of the code. These sections include also a lot of law pertaining to other kinds of insurance.

For the last 3 years the committee of which I am a member has been working upon a reasonable codification of the laws of the District on the subject of insurance. We have taken as a basis, to a great extent, the insurance codes of the States of New York, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and Ohio, to draft the present bill.

This bill has the approval of the Life Presidents Association; it has the approval of the insurance superintendent in the District; it has the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. It is very urgently needed. Unlike almost any State in the Union there is no law in the District controlling the provisions of the policy. Any kind of a policy can be written and sold in the District of Columbia. Now, in your State and in mine certain provisions must be inserted in standard policies written by insurance companies and certain other provisions may not be inserted in insurance policies.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. This proposed insurance law is based upon the experience of the four States mentioned and others.

Mr. HARLAN. There is absolutely no provision in this proposed code that is not to be found in existing law in some State. All the provisions in the pending bill have been interpreted many, many times by the courts of the different States.

Under certain types of policies that may be sold in the District, there is no assurance that if the holder of the policy defaults in his premium payments he may share in the surplus arising out of the policy.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman ever studied the evidence and my report of the investigation that I made of Insurance Commissioner Miller when he was superintendent of insurance here, and the charges I filed against him, which caused his removal, the papers being in the files of the District Committee?

Mr. HARLAN. While I have not seen it in the files, I have heard it discussed frequently.

Mr. BLANTON. I conducted that investigation, and I remember very distinctly that the evidence I produced showed that he had been charging each of the companies for doing business here so many hundred dollars a year, and was having each of them make him large annual donations, which he called his "entertainment funds." He had been collecting fraudulently thousands of dollars from the various insurance companies. Is there anything in the pending bill that will make such fraudulent practices impossible?

Mr. HARLAN. Unfortunately, that is, I think, beyond the law. That is just graft.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it caused the immediate removal of Insurance Commissioner Miller. At that time there was no other way of punishing him. He was collecting what he called an "entertainment fund" and he claimed it was voluntarily contributed and that he was entertaining people all over the United States with the money. The authorities here claimed he could not be prosecuted. I was hoping that there would be some safeguards put in this insurance code that would make such practices a specific crime.

Mr. HARLAN. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that this code has little to do with anything except life-insurance business and the agents who sell life insurance. The acts complained of by the gentleman would constitute a crime almost any place in the country. It would come within the category of bribery, graft, and things of that nature. The pending bill contains no specific provision against that. It is not covered any further than it is covered in the Criminal Code.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman does not, of course, mean to infer that the outstanding life-insurance companies of the country, such as the Prudential, the New York Life, the Mutual Life, the Metropolitan, and many others I can name, are following in the District of Columbia in the settling of claims any different practice than they follow in the State of Ohio or any other State in the Union?

Mr. HARLAN. I may say to the gentleman that we are not attempting to cure any defect of the responsible companies.

Mr. TRUAX. It is not a defect; it is an established custom, and it is a good custom.

Mr. HARLAN. The reliable companies are following in the District of Columbia the same customs they practice elsewhere, and their policies contain the standard provisions. It is the "fly-by-nights" we seek to reach. For example, a little company was organized down here in one of the nearby States—I will not mention the name—which put out a perfectly fraudulent advertisement, setting up a ratio of liquidity which showed it to be more reliable and more stable than some of the big companies. It sold lots of insurance in the District of Columbia. There is nothing against that kind of advertising when it is justified by the facts. We have in this proposed code, of course, a provision against fraudulent advertising, just as they have in almost every other place except the District. The final outcome in the illustration I mentioned was that the company became insolvent and thousands of policyholders in the District of Columbia lost money.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I have a complaint against a company here in the District that has been selling life insurance down in Texas. It sold life insurance to a great many people down there. Just 2 or 3 months ago it notified them that it was going out of business, and all these people suddenly found themselves with valueless policies in their possession.

Mr. HARLAN. Was that a company connected with a labor union?

Mr. BLANTON. It is the National Home Union, with offices at 723 Albee Building, Fifteenth and G Streets NW., Washington, D.C., and here is a notice that on March 20, 1934, it sent to one of my constituents, Mrs. Elsie F. Griffith, box 63, Anson, Tex., asking for the monthly remittance of $3.50; and that March 20, 1934, was the same day it closed its doors here. And when I got after them, here is the letter they sent:

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 21, 1934.

DEAR SIR: On the 20th day of March the National Home Union, by its president, W. T. Hardy, mailed out to all its members a letter stating that it was voluntarily liquidating its business under an agreement made with Government officials, and that the undersigned had been selected as attorney to carry out this liquidation. After this letter was mailed, Mr. Hardy remained in the office of the Home Union for a number of days, handling correspondence, etc. He has now left Washington, since which time all correspondence addressed to the Union comes directly to me.

In Mr. Hardy's letter of March 20 he stated that unearned dues would be refunded. This has now been done. I have received a number of letters, among which yours is one, which indicate that many members misunderstood the term "unearned dues." "Unearned dues" means dues paid in advance as of the closing date. For instance, if a member had paid dues for 3 months in advance, and the certificate was canceled 6 weeks after this payment was made, then one-half of the amount paid would be "earned" because the certificate stayed in effect for one-half of the 3 months. The other half would be "unearned" and would have to be refunded. That is what has been done in this case. The closing date was March 20. Cutting the records off as of that date, all dues which were unearned have been refunded.

Obviously dues collected all the way back cannot be refunded. These dues have been expended to pay the expense of the organization and to pay claims. I am now engaged in settling claims and other obligations which were still outstanding as of the 20th day of March. It will not be possible to tell exactly what these debts and claims come to until about the 1st of July. At that time if any funds remain on hand which are not required to pay debts and outstanding claims, such funds will be distributed to members of 1 year's standing, as provided by the bylaws of the organization. Beyond this there will be no funds out of which other money paid into the organization can be refunded.

If the books of the union show that your dues were paid in advance as of the 20th day of March, you should have already received a check. This check would not be for all dues paid by you, but only for dues which were unearned as of the closing date. All checks mailed out were for the amount of unearned dues as appears on the records of the union. If you have not received a check, then the records do not show anything due you; unless, of course, some mistake has been made.

Trusting that this explains the situation fully, I am

Very truly yours,

VERNON B. LOWREY,
Attorney, 1518 K Street NW., Washington, D.C.

Mr. BLANTON. The officials of this company ought to be in the penitentiary.

Mr. HARLAN. In the early eighties a group of individuals pretending to be union-labor members had passed through Congress a bill allowing mutual-aid societies to be created. Although it was expressly stipulated in the floor discussions when this bill was being enacted that insurance features were not to be included under mutual aid, nevertheless this group went to Texas and organized a mutual-aid company and started to write life insurance. They did a lot of business in Texas. When the Texas Insurance Department required them to submit their books for examination they said that they were a Federal company and not under the supervision of the Texas Insurance Department. When the Insurance Department of the District of Columbia demanded the right to examine their books, they refused such examination because they said they were not writing insurance in the District of Columbia. This is probably the company to which the gentleman refers, as I am sure it is not the Union Labor Life Insurance Co. of Washington, in which I myself am carrying a policy, which company, I understand, is perfectly sound. The Texas company was really masquerading as a union-labor organization rather than as a real life-insurance organization.

Mr. BLANTON. The following is another letter I received:

ANSON, TEX., May 28, 1934.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I have received a copy of a letter dated May 8 from you to Mr. W. T. Hardy relative to an insurance policy.

Attached is some correspondence of a neighbor and friend of mine relative to a similar policy. I think these letters are self-explanatory.

It seems as if Mr. Hardy has left Washington, and this business has been placed in the hands of Mr. Vernon B. Lowrey, 1518 K Street, Washington, D.C.

I am informed that the local agent, Mr. W. S. Dickerson, lives in Abilene, Tex., and has been selling policies of this nature for 15 years in this immediate section of the State. I am also informed that there are a large number of policyholders of this company in this surrounding territory.

Am sending the attached letters in order that you may understand more clearly the circumstances relative to this matter, and I trust that you will give the matter due consideration.

Thanking you in advance for any efforts on your part, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully,

Y. G. BARTLETT.

Is there anything in this proposed code to stop such fraudulent practices?

Mr. HARLAN. There is a provision in the law we passed 2 years ago that would stop it. That is probably the reason the company went out of business. It probably went out of business on account of the working of that law.

We had no law in the District whereby we could compel companies that organized in the District and went into some other States to come into the District for examination. We passed this law about a year ago, and I imagine that is what caused this company to go out of business.

There is nothing in the present law of the District to keep a man from walking out of the penitentiary and selling insurance. There is no way to control to whom licenses may be issued. There is no way to control advertising. There is no way to control the policies. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the District of Columbia here has absolutely no protection against fraudulent insurance companies. One company, the National Benefit Life, sold policies all over the United States to colored people. It came in here and dissipated its assets and became insolvent. There is no provision under our law here for the Insurance Commissioner to take over these insolvent companies and conserve their assets, as there is in your State and in my State. So this company had to go into court under the old procedure of asking for a receiver, which is slow and expensive, and by the time the receiver, appraisers, and all the experts had gotten through, there was no company that would take over this company and its policyholders. The colored people all over the South and throughout every part of the country lost every cent they had put into the company. There is nothing needed more in the District to protect the people here and to maintain decent, honest insurance than this code.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Has the gentleman been advised by or had the assistance of any of the insurance commissioners of the States in connection with this matter, or by insurance-company executives?

Mr. HARLAN. We have had the advice of the Life Presidents' Association, with their legal staff, and they unanimously approve this bill.

Mr. TRUAX. May I ask the gentleman about the case of the Gem Life Insurance Co., of Dayton, Ohio, which also dissipated its assets?

Mr. HARLAN. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Does the gentleman over there wish to yield any time?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield back our time.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PEYSER].

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, I happen to be familiar with this bill that we have before us and I know that it embodies the best that is now carried in the various insurance laws throughout the country. The laws of Wisconsin, Massachusetts, and, I think, New York are considered as standard forms of insurance laws. Most States have followed these three States, and I understand that in framing this law they have taken the best from the State laws throughout the country and put it together in order to give the best to the people of the District of Columbia.

As the situation exists now, there is absolutely no protection for the insurance buyer in the District of Columbia. The companies of better standing naturally write insurance in the District on the same terms as they do in the various States, but there is nothing here to exclude the company that comes in writing what we may call "wildcat coverage." There is nothing to protect the buyer against the unscrupulous salesmen of insurance.

If these laws are put into effect, it would bring to the insurance buyer the protection that is accorded to the buyers of every State of the Union and which the District buyer of insurance has been deprived of. The Life Insurance Presidents' Association, which I know collaborated in the preparation of this law, has taken into consideration the laws of the various States throughout the country, and from my knowledge of insurance and my knowledge of this law, I think it would be a terrible mistake if it were not passed. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: On page 102, line 9, after the last syllable and the word "establishment", insert "and to an association of Federal employees."

On line 10, after the word "only", strike out the word "all."

On line 11, strike out the first words "all of."

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I have discussed this amendment with the gentleman from Ohio and it is satisfactory to him.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is it the purpose of this amendment to put the Association of Federal Employees under regulation?

Mr. HARLAN. No; that is not the idea. This is in the section of the bill pertaining to group insurance. When the group-insurance provision was taken up, it only carried such groups as are taken care of in other sections of the country. Here in the District we have a number of organizations of Federal employees. Personally I think the section is broad enough to cover them, but this just extends the privilege of group insurance to these Federal employees' unions; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the rule, the Committee now rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SIROVICH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9178) to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia, pursuant to House Resolution 397, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TRUAX) there were—ayes 85, noes 1.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present, and challenge the vote on that ground.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How long is the Democratic filibuster going to last? We have had 8 or 10 roll calls.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. TRUAX. I will say to the gentleman that this is no Democratic filibuster. I had an amendment to offer to this bill and was not permitted to offer it.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold his point a moment, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are not 11 o'clock sessions rather early?

Mr. BYRNS. I appreciate that, but we will have to have a roll call or else we will have to stay here until 6 o'clock to finish this bill. I am trying to accommodate the convenience of the Members of the House by meeting at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Tennessee tell us what is to be the business in order tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. We will have up the housing bill tomorrow and that will take all day, and perhaps longer.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How much general debate will be allowed on that bill?

Mr. BYRNS. A rule has not been granted, and I do not know.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will that be the first thing in order tomorrow?

Mr. BYRNS. We will first have to finish this bill and that is the reason I want to meet at 11 o'clock. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point.

Mr. TRUAX. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman will not withdraw it and the gentleman will also object to the gentleman's unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BYRNS. Then we will have the roll call now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I had no chance to offer my amendment. I was deliberately shut out and I am tired of being gagged and hog-tied and bound.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

DEDICATION OF THE NEW POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT BUILDING

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein the address of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] delivered today at the dedication of the Post Office Department Building.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech by Hon. JAMES M. MEAD, Chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, at the dedication of the new Post Office Department Building on June 11, 1934:

Today we are dedicating a building of primary importance to every citizen of our Republic. It is the headquarters of a service which reaches out to every nook and corner of our land, to rich and poor, to crowded city dwellings, to isolated farm homes.

This splendid building, one of the finest in America, is a fitting symbol of the progress made throughout the years by the largest business activity in the world.

Back in 1639 the little tavern of Richard Fairbanks in Boston became our first post office. There were no post roads in those days, and months would go by as the letters were passed along, until they at last reached their destination. But as trails were made and methods of transportation improved, the post riders became familiar figures on the highways, and the postal system got its real start.

The post roads have blazed the paths of history. Wherever man settled, the post followed, keeping him in communication with those left behind, encouraging others to forge ahead to the new lands; and as the settlements developed, the post roads became the lanes of traffic and commerce.

All through its development the watchword of the Service has been "Speed up the mails." The newest and fastest methods of transportation have always been quickly adopted by the Postal Service. The stagecoach, the pony express, the steamboat, the railroad, the airplane—each one has added something to the speed of the mails.

Carrying Lincoln's first inaugural address, the pony express set a record over the 2,000-mile pathway in 7 days and 17 hours; this year the air mail set a new high record of 11 hours and 31 minutes, flying the mail from Los Angeles to New York City.

Along with speed, the Department has developed accuracy. Compare the direct methods of today, the privacy insured your mail, the promptness with which it is dispatched, with the crude methods early in the history of the Service—the long, hazardous trails, the dangers lurking along the way, the uncertainty of delivery, when every man was relied upon to aid in the transmittal of the mail.

This monumental building we are dedicating today not only symbolizes the growth of the Postal Service in its relation to the patrons; it also symbolizes the growth of an establishment which has been a model for private enterprise in its relation to its employees.

Coupled with quick and accurate delivery for the patrons of the Service, must be humane working conditions for the postal employees. As the largest business in the world, it is up to the Postal Service to set a standard for private enterprise. Retirement benefits, short working hours, annual vacations and sick leave with pay, pay for overtime, extra pay for night work, are all milestones toward this goal. But our job is not finished; we must not stop; more improvements must be adopted; and when they have become a part of our Postal Service, and private enterprise adopts these policies, then we will have reached the objective of the new deal—security for the worker, security for his family, security in his home, the hope of our great President.

Our postal employees are the Department's representatives and a vital part of the Service. The efficiency of the Service depends upon the efficiency of the employees, and their efficiency in turn depends upon what we do to provide good working conditions for them—a living wage, so that they may meet their bills and enjoy some of the comforts of life; opportunities to add to their store of knowledge, so that they may keep step with the world's progress and bring more intelligence to their jobs.

The Post Office Department has a tremendous obligation to its employees and, by example, to all the employees of the country; at the same time, it has a magnificent opportunity to point the way in this emergency. Our Post Office Committee desires to do its part; I know our Postmaster General, Mr. Farley, and his able corps of assistants are striving to do their share. If we adhere to the rich traditions of the past and continue to blaze the paths of progress, development, and understanding, we are sure to be successful in upholding the prestige of the Service and maintaining a business which is the finest in the world.

In this connection I desire to commend our Postmaster General and those associated with him. Under the most severe conditions, with almost insurmountable obstacles in his pathway, he has met the emergency and weathered the storm without separating a regular employee from the pay roll and by improving conditions as rapidly as opportunity permitted. Mr. Farley, there remains no trace of favoritism in the administration of the affairs of the Postal Service. You are giving a real service to the American public, a square deal to all who do business with your Department.

We have paused today to remember the glories of the past; we have given recognition to the achievements of the present; we are looking ahead with dreams for the future. We know that just as we have come to our present development, so in the years to come greater things will be unfolded, distances will be bridged even faster, the methods of today will become antiquated, the Postal Service will keep step with progress, and help lead our country to its ultimate development.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CLARK of North Carolina, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HEALEY, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. FITZPATRICK, for 4 days, on account of important official business.

To Mr. ROBERTSON, for the day.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 3553. An act to provide for the creation of a commission to examine into and report the clear height above the water of the bridge authorized to be constructed over the Hudson River from Fifty-seventh Street, New York, to New Jersey; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3739. An act authorizing the President to convey certain buildings, material, and equipment to the Government of the Republic of Haiti; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 3741. An act to convey certain lands to the State of South Dakota for public-park purposes, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 4337. An act to amend the judicial code by adding a new section to be numbered 274D;

H.R. 8781. An act to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and to amend the Federal Aid Road Act, approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 9184. An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to sell the old Tenley School to the duly authorized representative of St. Ann's Church of the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p.m.) the House, in accordance with its previous order, adjourned to meet tomorrow, Tuesday, June 12, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

Wilkerson, a district judge of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, and Walter C. Lindley, a district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Illinois; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LEHR: Resolution (H.Res. 431) to provide for the expenses of the investigation authorized by House Resolution 430; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. DUFFEY: Resolution (H.Res. 432) providing for the continuation of the investigation authorized by House Resolution 145; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. LEHR: Resolution (H.Res. 433) to provide for the expenses of continuing the investigation authorized by House Resolution 145; to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mrs. CLARKE of New York: A bill (H.R. 9908) granting an increase of pension to Jennette Knapp; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DOUTRICH: A bill (H.R. 9909) for the reinstatement in the United States Army of John Widder Bryan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PARSONS: A bill (H.R. 9910) granting a pension to Alice Floyd; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

5091. By Mr. LINDSAY: Petition of the Independent Petroleum Association, Washington, D.C., favoring the Federal petroleum bill (H.R. 9676); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

5092. Also, petition of G. J. Farrell, 1323 Broadway, Brooklyn, N.Y., on behalf of Local 2325, Brotherhood Railway & Steamship Clerks, favoring 6-hour day bill and old-age pension for railroad employees; to the Committee on Labor.

5093. Also, petition of the Brooklyn Real Estate Board, Brooklyn, N.Y., opposing the Wagner disputes bill; to the Committee on Labor.

5094. Also, petition of open-shop section of New York Employing Printers Association, opposing the Wagner labor bill; to the Committee on Labor.

5095. Also, petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, opposing the silver legislation; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

5096. Also, petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, favoring further study of the Wagner labor bill; to the Committee on Labor.

5097. Also, petition of the Sunrise Coal Co., Inc., Richmond Hill, N.Y., opposing the Wagner amended labor disputes bill, S. 2926; to the Committee on Labor.

5098. Also, petition of the American Institute of Warehousing, Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y., opposing the passage of the Wagner labor disputes bill; to the Committee on Labor.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JUNE 12, 1934

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 6, 1934)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Monday, June 11, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF CALENDAR TOMORROW

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate meets tomorrow it proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, commencing with Calendar No. 1243, and that if that call shall be completed the Senate recur to the consideration of the calendar for unobjected bills from the beginning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT SYSTEM

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas, what is the program with respect to Senate bill 3231, to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes? I should be very glad to have that bill taken up at as early a date as possible and placed on the preferred list for consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is my desire that the bill to which the Senator from Utah refers shall be speedily taken up; but tentative arrangements have been made first to consider what is known as the "Indian bill", and then the grazing bill. After those two bills shall have been disposed of, I shall be glad to cooperate to bring forward the bill the Senator from Utah mentions.

Mr. KING. Then it is obvious that within a few days the bill will be on its way to consideration?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it may be reached today.

INVESTIGATION OF MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS—NOTICE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that tomorrow, as soon after the meeting of the Senate as I may be able to obtain recognition, I desire to address the Senate on the subject of the investigation of the manufacture of munitions heretofore authorized by the Senate.

STATEMENTS AS TO VOTES AND PAIRS ON SILVER BILL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, yesterday, about quarter to 6, I was called from the Senate Chamber. I realized that we were approaching a vote on the silver bill, but I felt that if I could secure a pair there would not be any jeopardy either in the vote on the issue or to the individual Senators; so I secured a pair with my friend from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH]. On the basis of the amendments which were before me, I suggested that it was not essential that anything be stated except the fact of the general pair.

This morning as I read the papers and found that the bonus question had been voted on, I was not only amazed but I was shocked. I had no idea, not the slightest hint from any source, that a bill that had been reported would be sought to be attached to a piece of silver legislation in the form of an amendment. I am aware that the rules of the Senate are loose enough to permit it, but surely we ought to have some modification of our rules on a question like that. Consequently, I am mentioned as not voting, which is true, and in the list of pairs the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is announced as having a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH]. As that stands, it would appear to some readers that I was for the bonus and the Senator from Illinois was against it.

I do not know how the Senator from Illinois stood on the matter, but the country knows how I have always stood upon it. I have invariably opposed the proposal known as the "cash payment" of the bonus; but unfortunately, having been called from the Senate Chamber without any suggestion that that sort of an amendment would be offered, I am somewhat embarrassed. I simply rise to make the statement that had I been here yesterday afternoon when the amendment was offered I should have voted against the proposal, and at any time that it might have come up I should have voted against it; and I should like, if it be in order, to have my statement appear in the permanent RECORD following the vote, because I do not wish to be misunderstood. In other words, there is not anything to me so distasteful as the charge that a Senator has dodged an issue. I despise a situation of that kind.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I assure the Senator that upon the motion made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], in the manner made and for the purposes made, both Senators from Illinois—my eminent colleague [Mr. DIETERICH] and myself—would have voted "nay." The able Senator from Ohio may rest assured of such position. Therefore, he should not be embarrassed by any assumption that my colleague's vote would have been "yea" on that motion. It would have been the same as that of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, have I the consent of the Senate to have my statement appear in the permanent RECORD following the vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on yesterday, at the time the vote was taken on the silver bill and amendments thereto, I had been requested by the relief committee of the State of Maryland to attend a meeting with Mr. Harry Hopkins, and during the time the vote was being taken I was necessarily absent. I wanted to make the statement for the RECORD that I was in Mr. Hopkins' office conferring with the relief committee of Maryland, which had asked me to accompany them for that purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this point, touching the RECORD, I wish to confirm the statement made by the eminent Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] at the time of the vote on the silver bill. I was present in the Postmaster General's Department, where there was something of a celebration attendant on the opening of the new quarters of the Post Office Department, and I missed the vote.

The statement of the Senator from Rhode Island was correct, that had I been present I would have voted "yea", and the statement for himself that he would have voted "nay", I take it, was his announcement as to the silver bill.

Mr. HEBERT. That is correct.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I announce the continued absence of the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], occasioned by illness; and the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], my colleague the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], who are necessarily detained.

I desire further to announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] is absent in attendance on the funeral of the late Representative Coffin, of Idaho.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are necessarily absent, and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES TO PRIVATELY OWNED PROPERTY (S.DOC. NO. 213)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an estimate of appropriation submitted by the Department of Agriculture to pay claims for damages to privately owned property in the sum of $888.69, which have been considered and adjusted under the provisions of law and require appropriations for their payment, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION—CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES BY COLLISION WITH NAVAL VESSELS (S.DOC. NO. 214)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of appropriation submitted by the Navy Department to pay claims for damages by collision with naval vessels, in the sum of $3,072, which have been considered and adjusted under the provisions of law and require an appropriation for their payment, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the Federal Reserve Board covering operations for the year 1933, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

MONTHLY REPORT OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATOR

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Administrator covering the period from March 1 to March 31, 1934, inclusive, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting copy of a resolution adopted by the Municipal Council of Guinayangan, Province of Tayabas, P.I., expressing its gratitude for enactment of Public Law No. 127, Seventy-third Congress, known as the "new Philippine Independence Act", which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from Division 171, Order of Railway Conductors, Mechanicsville, N.Y., signed by H. I. Gardner, secretary, praying for the passage of Senate bill 3231, providing for the pensioning of railway employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry Santa Fe Railway employees of the Los Angeles Terminal, Calif., praying for the enactment of pending legislation for the benefit of railway employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Ralph Almsteadt, secretary-treasurer of Pension Chapter, No. 66, of New York City, N.Y., praying on behalf of sundry railway employees for the passage of Senate bill 3231, providing for the pensioning of railroad employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

NOMINATION OF REXFORD G. TUGWELL

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution, under date of June 9, of the American Coalition of Patriotic, Civic, and Fraternal Societies, with head offices in the Southern Building, at Washington, D.C., which I send to the desk and with which I am in complete sympathy and whole-hearted accord, and which, moreover, I feel is very timely at just the present moment, be spread in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN COALITION OF PATRIOTIC,
CIVIC, AND FRATERNAL SOCIETIES,
Washington, D.C.

Whereas Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell, who has been nominated for Under Secretary of Agriculture, is known to be a pronounced advocate of principles of government which are subversive and inimical to our system of constitutional government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Coalition, representing 94 patriotic, civic, and fraternal organizations throughout the United States, That we protest against his confirmation, which would amount to an authorization by the Senate of continuance of this radical course and a ratification of his many utterances aimed at the destruction of our most cherished institutions.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
By JOHN B. TREVOR, President.

JUNE 9, 1934.

By Mr. ERICKSON (by request):

A bill (S. 3784) to provide for the issue of a supplementary currency without interest based on certain commodities and payable in commodities; to create a Supplementary Currency Board with power to fix wholesale prices on the commodities on which this supplementary currency is based in cooperation with representatives of agriculture and industry, and to regulate the issue and use of such currency; to provide for the organization of associations in agriculture, industry, and business that may receive such supplementary currency upon giving title to the United States to commodities against which this supplementary currency may be issued; to strengthen the control of production and distribution of the basic commodities directly affected through regulating the issue and use of this supplementary currency; to regulate imports and foreign trade to the extent necessary to protect the economic and financial structure of the United States; and to accomplish other related purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 3785) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act so as to extend the provisions thereof to private corporations to aid in constructing and maintaining facilities for the marketing, storing, warehousing, and/or processing of forest products; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 3786) for the relief of Heinrich Schmidt, of Flensburg, Germany; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 139) to protect the revenue by regulation of the traffic in containers of distilled spirits; to the Committee on Finance.

RETIREMENT SYSTEM FOR RAILROAD EMPLOYEES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. METCALF submitted seven amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3231) to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF BANKING ACT OF 1933—AMENDMENT

Mr. RUSSELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3748) to amend certain sections of the Banking Act of 1933 and the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

DIVERSIFICATION OF PRISON INDUSTRIES—AMENDMENT

Mr. HEBERT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 9404) to authorize the formation of a body corporate to insure the more effective diversification of prison industries, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REGULATION OF TOBACCO-GROWING INDUSTRY—AMENDMENTS

Mr. FLETCHER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 9690) to place the tobacco-growing industry on a sound financial and economic basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in the production and marketing of tobacco entering into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF ACTIVITIES OF FREIGHT ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 22), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Federal Trade Commission be, and the same is hereby, directed to make an investigation and study of the activities of the freight associations of the United States and of the action of the railroads in jointly prescribing rates through such associations, and report the results thereof to the Congress as soon as practicable, showing specifically the action of said associations, especially in making rates between different freight territories and reporting whether or not such activities violate the antitrust laws as applied to the Act to Regulate Commerce in the Central Yellow Pine and Tift Lumber cases (10 I.C.C. 505, 548; 138 Fed. 753; 206 U.S. 441).

JENNIE JONES

Mr. WALSH submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 266), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Jennie Jones, widow of George R. Jones, late an employee in the Senate Office Building under direction of the custodian of said building, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

INVESTIGATION OF RELATIONSHIP OF FREIGHT RATES

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 267), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and the same is hereby, requested to make an investigation and study of the relationship of rates in different parts of the United States and report the result thereof to the Congress of the United States as soon as practicable, showing:

First. The relative book value and value fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the properties of class 1 railroads in the United States, separating such values so as to show the same in the three large freight territories of the country.

Second. The cost of hauling freight, so far as the records disclose, in each of the said several territories.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON INVESTIGATION OF RACKETS

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 268), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Commerce of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 1,000 copies of part 4 of the hearings held before a subcommittee of said committee during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress on the resolution (S.Res. 74) entitled "A resolution authorizing an investigation of the matter of so-called 'rackets', with a view to their suppression."

NATURAL BEAUTIES OF KENTUCKY

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Honorable Desha Breckinridge, editor of the Lexington Herald, at the fourth annual mountain laurel festival in Bell County, Ky., and also an editorial appearing in the same publication on June 5, 1934, entitled "Go to the Hills Where Beauty Abides."

There being no objection, the address and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lexington (Ky.) Herald, Sunday, June 3, 1934]

TRIBUTE IS PAID TO RESIDENTS OF MOUNTAINS—DESHA BRECKINRIDGE LAUDS SONS OF HIGHLANDS WHO HAVE GAINED GREAT FAME

Tribute to the noble race that inhabits the Kentucky mountains was paid in the speech delivered by Desha Breckinridge, editor of the Herald, last Friday, at the fourth annual mountain laurel festival in Bell County.

Mr. Breckinridge, in his address, pointed out that in every State sons from these highlands have played a great part, and he lauded the new spirit which is tending to bind all sections of the great Commonwealth of Kentucky into one homogeneous unit.

The complete text of Mr. Breckinridge's address at the mountain laurel festival follows:

"Mr. Chairman and fellow Americans, I cannot express my appreciation of the opportunity to be present here today, given to me because of the partial friendship of Mrs. Cromwell and those in charge of this celebration.

"More than half a century ago it is since I first came to this section. That great Kentuckian, Nathaniel S. Shaler, who created the Kentucky Geological Survey and became the best beloved professor at Harvard, to whom Kentucky owes a great debt, and John R. Proctor, who succeeded Professor Shaler as head of the Geological Survey in Kentucky, persuaded my father to take his family to spend the summer in Cumberland Gap with the students brought by Professor Shaler for the Harvard summer school. That journey was far different from the trip I have made today. We went by train from Lexington to Louisville, from Louisville to Knoxville, and by wagon drawn by mules from Knoxville to Cumberland Gap, where for 6 weeks we camped.

"Impossible it is for my faltering tongue to describe, even to indicate the difference between that trip and this country then, and the trip I have made to come today and this country now.

"Again, in later years, upon my return to Kentucky from college I came to this region and witnessed something of the intense activity of which Big Stone Gap and Middlesboro were the products.

"There has never been an hour since those days of long ago that I have not had love for this section, have not had keen realization of the truth uttered by David when in the Psalms he said: 'I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help.'

"I have understood something of the joy, mayhap I should not confess that I have often envied the fate that led those who came through Cumberland Gap and along the Wilderness Trail to stop and build their homes where they could look to the hills from whence they got strength and inspiration. Kindred all were they who came from North Carolina and Tennessee and Virginia along that trail and through that gap to build a Commonwealth, that in my judgment has had more potent influence in the development of American civilization than any of her sister States.

"Inheritors they were of common traditions, in whose veins there flowed the commingled blood of the Norman, the Angle, the Saxon, the Dane, and the Celt, fused into that marvelous race, speaking the English language, preserving valiantly and rigorously the principle of Anglo-Saxon liberty.

"Worthy descendants they were of those who sat in judgment upon a king, who followed Cromwell, who established the greatest Commonweath of the world. They carried with them always, even to the uttermost parts of the earth, the principle of liberty regulated by law, freedom of speech, and right of individual ownership of property; that found its concrete expression in the accepted dictum that a man's home is sacred, whether it be castle or cabin, into which, though the wind enters through the crevices, the king himself may not enter except in response to the invitation of the owner or in accord with the mandate of the law.

"In 1750, a hundred and eighty-four years ago, Dr. Thomas Walker and his companions first penetrated through Cumberland Gap, named by him, as was the river, for the Duke of Cumberland. Fitting it is that one whose ancestors sprang from his loins, Mrs. Annie Walker Burns, has had her thought translated by descendants of companions of his into this great celebration.

"Dr. Walker's coming marked the very beginning of the conquest of the West, the Southwest, the Northwest and the South. From that day on until 1769, when Daniel Boone and four companions left Yadkin to explore the land that the vision of Richard Henderson beheld as a great empire, there were a number driven by the zest of adventure, impelled by the quest for land, who penetrated the forests and braved the dangers of the Indians. Christopher Gist, in 1750; John Finley, in 1752 and 1767; Henry Skaggs, in 1764; James Smith and his companions under Isaac Lindsey; James Harrod and Michael Stoner are some who during those years explored the hunting grounds of Kentucky.

"But the real exploration of Kentucky came after the Stanwix Treaty of 1786, by which the Six Nations ceded to Virginia their claims to the country between the Ohio and Tennessee Rivers, and thus gave to Virginia the nominal right to the Kentucky country.

"With the coming of Boone and the long hunters there began a migration that is among the most remarkable in all the annals of the world. The settlement of Kentucky was in defiance of royal edict. In 1763 a royal proclamation expressly forbade the granting of warrants of survey or patents beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean or further west.

"There were already then mutterings of the storm that found its expression in the American Revolution, so that the King desired to limit the growth of the colonies west of the Alleghenies and to confine the increase to the narrow scope between the mountain range of the seacoast, that was accessible by navigable rivers and could, therefore, be controlled from the seacoast and those rivers.

"Kentucky is the only State whose very existence was created in express disobedience of all governmental authority. Before the Revolution broke, in 1774 when the merchants of the old Bay Colony were preparing for Bunker Hill, Henry was thundering in Williamsburg and Franklin leading toward revolution, a house was built where this State now exists—a log cabin, it is true, yet it consecrated all the State to that Anglo-Saxon civilization which founds the State on the family and was evidence, proof that they who came as adventurers were settlers and builders of States.

"Could one but revive that long ago, contemplate the present and project himself into the future with full realization of what the brief years since Boone came through Cumberland Gap have brought, what would be the picture he would paint?

"I cannot even indicate in the time that I may take, the contrast. I can but suggest what mayhap another more able, more devoted, though loving Kentucky no more than do I, may paint. June 7, 1769, it was, when Boone first feasted his eyes 'with the unrivaled valley of the Kentucky.' What a contrast the picture of today would be by the side of the picture of that date if artist or poet or orator could in fitting colors or apt words paint America in 1769 as we see it today. It would stagger human credulity.

"The records of those days have been scattered. In the Draper collection at Madison, Wis.; in the Dunne collection at the University of Chicago; in the Breckinridge collection at the Congressional Library; in garrets and in old desks there are priceless records of the toil and the dangers, the sacrifices and the triumphs of those who explored the wilderness and laid the foundation of the State. The records should be gathered in Kentucky, in this section marking the very doorstep to the great domain that is largely due to Kentucky. There should be gathered the letters and the diaries and the maps, the records of those glorious days when the buckskin-clad pioneers came to Kentucky.

"It is fitting that the American Order of Pioneers, a national organization, with headquarters in Washington, has designated this year—that is, the bicentenary of the birth of Daniel Boone—as 'Pioneer Year' in honor of the pioneers to whom this Nation and the world owes an unpayable debt of gratitude. At Boonesboro on September 3 there will be a national gathering to make recognition of that debt to Boone and those of whom he is typical.

"And then there should be an adequate history written of what their coming has meant. I may but faintly indicate the part that Kentucky played, but suggest what would be the difference in the world had those who came through Cumberland Gap obeyed instead of defied the royal edict forbidding the settlement beyond the headwaters of the streams that flowed into the Atlantic to the eastward.

"It is 142 years ago today that the long efforts of those who settled and led Kentucky were crowned with victory—Kentucky admitted to the Union. The records of the years during which the settlers of Kentucky strove to secure an independent State government are full of romance and pregnant with mighty events. Even with that victory it is impossible for us of today to appreciate the condition of Kentucky on June 1, 1792. There were less than 100,000 residents of Kentucky. The British posts in the Northwest had not been surrendered. Indian tribes, led by the great statesman and warrior, Tecumseh, were active and aggressive. There was haunting fear of the closing of the Mississippi. As measured by modes of travel of today, she was months separated from the seat of the Federal Government and the capitals of her sister States, the interests of some of which she held justly to be hostile to her interests.

"As revealed by the vote of the majority of her representatives in the Virginia convention, she was opposed to the ratification of the Federal Constitution, sharing the views of the seer, statesman, orator, Patrick Henry. With no stable financial system, pressed with the burden of military organizations and Indian campaigns, the prospect might daunt the bravest. Yet her very settlement, her history during the brief years from the entrance of Boone in '69 till her admission as a State in '92 had revealed and developed a spirit of heroic self-reliance, of superb fortitude, of surpassing political wisdom.

"Kentucky pioneers made three great contributions to political science. For the first time in all the world there was granted the right of suffrage to man as man. For the first time representation was based on numbers, not on wealth nor education nor station of the inhabitants. For the first time they separated and reduced to definite terms the separation of the functions of government, separated not only the functions but the persons who should discharge legislative, executive, and judicial duties.

"They recognized the imperative necessity that the Mississippi should be free, to which in large, in major measure was due the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory. During the dangerous years, filled with hardships, the Kentuckians who followed Boone never faltered in their rigid determination that there should be free navigation of the Mississippi River. In largest measure it was due to them that Jefferson's dream became a reality. It was a Kentuckian, John Breckinridge, who introduced in the Senate the bill for the government of the Louisiana Territory and was appointed by Jefferson as Attorney General in his Cabinet largely for the purpose of codifying and administering the laws governing that Territory.

"It was Merriwether Lewis who with William Clark headed the Lewis-Clark expedition that went to the Pacific and laid the foundation for the creation of the States of the West. The mere list of the States created from the Louisiana Purchase indicates something of how great would have been the change had they remained under Spanish or French dominion—Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, and Oklahoma. It is true that part, one-third of Minnesota and Colorado and mayhap one-fifth of Wyoming and Montana, was not included in the Louisiana Purchase, but had a hostile power obtained control of the Louisiana Territory, no part of those States would today be included in the boundaries of the United States. Had the royal edict forbidding the settlement of Kentucky been obeyed, George Rogers Clark would not have won the Battle of Vincennes and gained an empire for the young Nation.

"Can human imagination picture the difference in the history of the world had the French or the Spaniard remained in control of the Louisiana Territory, from which has been carved the empire States of the West and the Southwest, and had the English retained the Northwest?

"Kentuckians they were who persuaded Jefferson to abandon or disregard his view that the Constitution as adopted did not permit the acquisition of new territory but required an amendment thereto. George Rogers Clark—Lewis and Clark would never have conducted their expeditions had it not been that because of the migrations from Virginia and North Carolina and Tennessee, Kentucky was won by the English-speaking race.

"And that is but a part of the influence that Kentucky has had. Henry Clay, elected Speaker of the House of Representatives in his first term in Congress, changed the office of Speaker from that of a mere presiding officer to the second greatest office in the Government. Primarily due to him it was that the second war of independence was launched, the last battle of which was won at New Orleans by Kentuckians under Jackson, who, behind their cotton bales, held their fire until they could see the eyeballs of the advancing Redcoats.

"Kentuckians they were, led by the son of Henry Clay, who won the Battle of Buena Vista, where young Henry Clay gave his life for his country and helped make certain the independence of Texas.

"Had the citizens of Kentucky been united either for the Confederacy or for the Union, the story of the War between the States might have been different. Here in these hills and valleys and coves there was such passionate devotion to the Union that from them went an army greater in numbers than the quota fixed by the Federal Government for the State to furnish. Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis were but typical of the division among Kentucky's sons. It may well be that the devotion of the people of the mountains of Kentucky to the Union made the Federal forces triumphant.

"A noble race it is that inhabits these mountains. In every State sons from these highlands have played a great part. I know of no other instance in American history where a man who followed one vocation until past 40 and then gave up the profession of medicine to become a lawyer achieved the highest distinction that can be given to an American lawyer—an appointment to the Supreme Court—as did Justice Miller, of Barbourville. And he was but a type of the brain, the spirit, and the blood that is found throughout this land where they look to the hills from whence cometh strength.

"And what of the future? In the days when I first came to these mountains, more than 50 years ago, Kentucky was divided into six great territories—the valley of the Cumberland, the valley of the Big Sandy, the valley of the Kentucky, the valley of the Licking, the valley of the Tennessee, and the valley of the Green. Today, with good roads, we from the blue grass, from the valley of the Kentucky, others from the valley of the Licking, the Tennessee, the Green, can come in fewer hours than it then took days to come, fewer hours than it took our pioneer forebears weeks.

"Homogeneous, we are, in tradition and in blood. But we have not always been alike in aspiration. Now, we may become so; with better acquaintance, with more frequent visits, with freer intercommunication and with full knowledge and deep reverence for the past, we may turn our face to the future with the assurance that they who are descendants from the builders of the State, from the men who led to the Pacific, who won an empire at Vincennes, who demanded and obtained the right to free navigation of the Mississippi, who waged triumphantly the second war of independence, who helped to preserve the Union, will carry on as worthy sons and daughters of the pioneer men and women who trod the Wilderness Trail, builded a commonwealth of homes where virtue abides and courage rules, and won an empire for the English-speaking race of which they are today so great a part."

GO TO THE HILLS WHERE BEAUTY ABIDES

Have you ever been to the mountains in laurel time? Have you ever driven from Lexington past the fallow fields of Fayette, down the gorge of the Kentucky, up the hill that leads to the rolling meadows of Madison, on to Berea, through Mount Vernon, London, Corbin, across the Rockcastle to Pineville, then to Middlesboro, Cumberland Gap, and climbed the mountain to the Pinnacle?

You have never driven over more beautiful roadways, never traveled through more varied and more alluring scenery. No one can adequately picture, we do not even attempt to describe, the beauty of the fields and meadows, the charm of the ravines and the gorges, the lure of the hillsides, the glory of the mountains.

The laurel, magnolia, tulip trees are now in bloom. The rhododendron will quickly come. For the next several weeks the varied greens of the shrubs and trees will be splashed with the vivid color of the blossoms. And that drive is but an introduction to the hills and the valleys of the Cumberland. Only some 4 or 5 hours it takes to run from Lexington to Cumberland Gap. Yet much longer time may well be taken. Days are spent by many in visting lands not nearly so lovely, so redolent with romance, so pregnant with great possibilities as is the territory traversed in the trip from the Blue Grass to the Cumberlands.

Thousands and tens of thousands visit Pike's Peak. We found in our mail upon our return from a trip to Pineville, pictures of the Chilean Andes, the Pao de Assucar, Rio de Janeiro; the Lago del Inca in the Chilean Andes, and the Aconcagus from the Argentine side. The altitude of these mountains is higher, the gorges are deeper, it is true, than the mountains of Kentucky, Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee. But the country is little more striking, the sense of space and of power is scarcely less.

From the Pinnacle Rock one can see Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, the six great States that are the reservoir of the purest blood of the English-speaking race, in which there are contrasts between the leaders of the civilization of today and representatives of the civilization, customs, language, and thought of centuries ago.

Only a century and a half it is since the long hunters started the migration that led to the settlement of Kentucky, to the conquest and preservation of the continent by that civilization known today as American.

Can anyone standing on that peak and gazing over that far-flung land picture what the next century and a half will hold? Is it not worth while for us of the lowlands to become familiar with both the people and the beauties of the highlands?

The Pinnacle and Cumberland Gap are but two of the innumerable points of interest in that great domain drained by the Cumberland, the Kentucky, and the Big Sandy. Cumberland Falls, which is reached by a road that passes through one of the most beautiful sections we have ever traversed, is well worth visiting, even by those who have feasted their eyes on the glory of Niagara Falls and have seen the falls of Yosemite.

Days, if not weeks, may well be spent in becoming acquainted with the hills and the valleys of eastern and southeastern Kentucky. The cities and towns and villages that have grown up in those hills are well worth visiting. There are tourist camps scattered throughout the whole region. There are numerous excellent inns and traverns and hotels where the courtesy of generous hospitality makes the visitor feel as though among home folk. There are golf courses and country clubs. The second oldest golf course in America, so it is said, and as beautiful as any in all America, is at Middlesboro. At Harlan the country club and golf course give indication that the men and women of that highland country have time for social companionship and healthful recreation.

The streams and the lakes give the disciples of Izaak Walton opportunity to display their skill with the assurance of fitting reward. In the not-distant future there will be great game and fish preserves, as there should be, where deer and wild turkey will roam the forests, where bass and trout and blue catfish will teem the rivers and streams.

We do not now attempt to tell of the pageant held at Pineville June 1, the one hundred and forty-second anniversary of the admission of Kentucky to the Union. We have never seen so remarkable a natural amphitheater as that in which that pageant was held. It must be seen for one to have even an adequate realization of its charm and unique construction by the Master's hand. The sounding board that projects the music of instruments, the voices of speakers and singers hundreds of feet, faces a gradually rising slope upon which thousands may sit and everyone see the natural platform at the base of the cliff.

There could not be a lovelier sight than the procession of young girls from a score of schools and colleges, garbed in striking colors, as they marched from the thicket of the bending, blooming laurel onto the stage and then, as the court of the queen gathered, a hundred or more all gowned alike, holding the royal court.

One of the most inspiring, as it was the most striking, features of the pageant was the demonstration of generous, whole-hearted cooperation between the various communities of that region. From London and Barbourville, from Corbin and Williamsburg, from Middlesboro and Harlan there were men and matrons and maids who united with the citizens of Pineville in making of the pageant a revelation of a people instead of only a pageant of a country.

It has been many years since we were last in that section. Pressure of obligation, lack of time kept us from staying so long as we wanted to stay, or visiting so many people as we wanted to visit. But it will not be long till we go back. We do a favor to whomever is induced by what we say to make the tour of the mountains and become acquainted with the people and familiar with the beauties of our State.

ADDRESS BY DEAN WEST, OF PRINCETON

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address by Dean West to the Nassau Club, of Princeton University, as published in the Princeton Alumni Weekly.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Princeton Alumni Weekly]

Dean West

Gentlemen of the Nassau Club, in view of these encomiums of the president, if I were modest, I would blush; I do not blush, whatever be the reason. I am grateful indeed for this complimentary dinner, and so will anyone in this room be at a similar dinner when he is 81.

Princeton is a home town. When its men are not at their work they are at home, as a rule; and that characteristic of this community has persisted from generation to generation. So much so that one English visitor, coming back to Princeton after 20 years' absence, said: "In the regularity and stability of its life, it is the analogue of the solar system."

So it is the fact that it is a home-living and home-loving town that makes Princeton a delightful place to live in; and if those born here are fortunate, we who were not born here and live here may consider ourselves fortunate that we were born at all.

It is a good place to grow old in, and it seems to me that there are more happy old persons here than in other communities. It is indeed a good place to grow old in, and I can say truly that the last few years have been among the happiest of my life.

I am reminded of a conversation I had with Thomas Hughes, the author of Tom Brown, at Oxford, at a time when I was 25 and he was very old. He spoke of some of the lessons a long life can teach, and said to me, "The two finest times in life are the sunrise and the sunset." One lesson it seems to me is this: That we should seek happiness and wish to live at all times in a happy manner. That is not always a very easy thing to do. It is not the spirit of great self-esteem which is the great spirit. Anybody can have that. It has also been constantly impressed upon me that we should not live on our dislikes, but should realize there is some good in every man and should look out for that; and if that is developed other good things will develop. That was one of the reasons for the very happy success of President Hibben. He looked for the good in every man.

And then there is another thing. A man should have the instincts of a gentleman. The humblest laborer in the ditch is often a better gentleman than his employer. Being a gentleman is not a matter of speech, clothes, or manner; it is a matter of something inside; and that something inside has two factors: First, a gentleman will not take a mean advantage of another; he may take an honorable advantage, but a mean advantage, never; and the second and higher trait, the highest in fact, is that a gentleman is always considerate of others, even if they are not considerate of him. Another element that affects our happiness is station in life, position, wealth, public office, or distinction. All well enough. But position and wealth alone will not lead to happiness. They do not settle the internal things, the real things of life.

In this connection I am reminded of a very wise remark by President Patton in commenting on the attempts to construct a Christianity without Christ. He said: "If you take from anything everything which makes it something, you have nothing." If you take from life certain invisible things and then talk of happiness, you have nothing. What are those invisible things? Well, I should say courage, courage not merely to dare, but the higher courage to endure; another is fidelity; another is patience; another, kindliness; another, the greater one, is friendliness. Leave these out and life is scarcely worth living. The everything which made life something is nearly all gone. And so, if this is true, and I believe it is, the internal life counts most and the external life least. If the inside is right, the outside will take care of itself, whether we have wealth and station or not.

Then, there are faith and hope, the two guiding lights which help do much toward making a really happy life. These are things beyond the range of the physical elements, beyond the range of the ponderable; they are the imponderable things, the things that determine our careers.

And so, as I come to the close of this talk, I am reminded of the words of William Watson, the English poet who went insane, afterward recovered his reason, and expressed the beautiful spirit of life in his lines:

"As we wax older on this earth,
Till many a toy that charmed us seems
Emptied of beauty, stripped of worth,
And mean as dust and dead as dreams—
For gauds that perished, shows that passed,
Some recompense the fates have sent:
Thrice lovelier shine the things that last,
Things that are more excellent."

And now let me close with the familiar and beautiful words of Browning:

"Grow old along with me!
The best is yet to be,
The last, for which the first was made."

TEXTILE-LABOR SETTLEMENT—GENERAL JOHNSON'S STATEMENT

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD the text of the statement of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson on the textile labor settlement.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF JOHNSON STATEMENT ON TEXTILE LABOR SETTLEMENT

(WASHINGTON, June 3.—The text of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson's statement that his order for 25-percent curtailment in the cotton textile industry would stand and that the strike scheduled for tomorrow had been averted follows:)

The threatened cotton textile strike was conditioned on N.R.A. rescinding its own order restricting machine hours 25 percent during the usual summer slump, which for the past few years has averaged approximately 25-percent decline in production. At present there is a very large surplus of goods unsold and disastrous shut-downs were threatened. The idea of the order was to spread these inevitable reductions over the whole industry equally (with exceptions for the smaller mills and certain special cases) and thus to sustain employment on the widest possible basis.

PREVENTS LONG SHUT-DOWNS

The order prevented shut-downs for long periods by requiring that reductions be by days instead of weeks or months, except that shut-downs for normal causes, such as inventory, repairs, etc., shall not be prevented.

No argument against either the wisdom or the equity of this order has been presented. On the contrary, labor representatives in the present conference admitted the necessity for this action and that the strike was not against the order at all, but only to secure a 33⅓-percent increase in hourly rates of pay and certain other demands.

STRIKE ORDER RESCINDED

While N.R.A. is willing to do anything it can to compose differences as they arise it cannot proceed to any action under the threat of a strike against its own order. Accordingly, the first article of settlement countermands the strike order.

Labor representatives in the present conference now concede that the real issues are:

1. Their right to represent members of their union in collective bargaining.

2. Certain other grievances alleged to be in violation of the code; but principally.

3. A demand for an increase of 33⅓ percent in the labor element of the cost of cotton textiles.

There is no question that labor is entitled to prompt and effective relief of any just complaint under 1 and 2, or of the duty of N.R.A. to secure it. The most effective instrumentality we have as yet tried in labor disputes was the President's suggestion in the settlement of the automobile strike.

There is already an industrial relations board in the cotton textile industry and it has functioned exceptionally well—better, perhaps, than any similar set-up; but to bring it into the field of action of the Wollman board its powers required further definition and its membership had to include a representative of labor in the cotton textile industry.

ACCEPTED BY LABOR

A basis of settlement was the administrator's agreement to urge upon this industry such definition and amendment of the industrial relations board as would accord with the President's formula in the automobile settlement. Labor accepts this and it is believed that this will go far to quiet the present unrest and prevent future disturbance.

Labor in this industry is also to be given representation on the labor advisory board and is to have an adviser to the Government members on the code authority. Studies of all assertions of other general grievances are to be continued.

So much for the first two causes of complaint. As to wages, it is clear that no such violent increase as 33⅓ percent in all wage scales, if any, can be considered at this time. The rise in the price of cotton textiles has been one of the chief consumer complaints.

INCREASE IN COST

Including the processing tax, raw cotton costs have increased 150 percent. There has been a 70 percent increase in labor costs due to the code and other influences, and an increase of 94 percent in cost of labor, material, and supplies in cotton textiles.

A very clear cause of decreased consumption is this increased cost and increased prices which flow from it. In this situation any such increase in cost would paralyze production and employment and defeat the very ends aimed at.

The course of negotiations has not been helped by the concurrent newspaper debate between the parties to them. Fairness to N.R.A. and to a great industry and to its accomplishments for labor under the N.R.A. compels me to correct several inaccurate statements which appeared in news dispatches yesterday and which were attributed to officials of the United Textile Workers.

A statement that the administration of the cotton textile code "through lack of enforcement has brought it to a point of precode conditions" is simply without foundation in fact. I know of no code under the N.R.A. that is administered more conscientiously and more effectively than this code has been and is being administered by its code authority.

FINDS WAGES HIGHER

The statement that wages "have been forced down to lower than ever before" is equally unfounded. The very opposite is true. The record shows that the present hourly wage rate as well as weekly earnings adjusted to living costs (real wages) have reached and passed the highest 1929 level.

Between April 1933 and April 1934 pay rolls in this industry increased over 100 percent; between March 1933 and April 1934 employment increased 34 percent. Average actual weekly earnings increased between March 1933 and February 1934 about 35 percent.

The improvement of labor conditions under this code surpasses that in any other industry and, in addition to the wage improvements mentioned, includes the wiping out of unfavorable working conditions, such as child labor, unconscionable hours, and unregulated stretch-out.

WORK OF INSTITUTE

The improvements have been retained and at the time they were obtained through an N.R.A. code hearing and months of patient work with the Cotton Textile Institute prior to the code there was no substantial labor organization in the industry.

For that work the generous cooperation of the industry, with the steady insistence of N.R.A., deserves credit. In such circumstances insistence that labor in this industry cannot expect protection under the code except through membership in a particular union is also unwarranted. It is not necessary to be a member of a particular union in order to enjoy the benefits of the cotton-textile code.

This is code no. 1—that of the first industry to answer the President's early observations on the benefit of the principles of N.I.R.A., made weeks before the enactment of the law. Strictures on the good faith of that industry are unwarranted and unjust.

TEXT OF SETTLEMENT

The text of the settlement follows:

1. Strike order to be countermanded without prejudice to the right of labor to strike.

2. One representative of employees of the cotton-textile industry to be appointed by the Secretary of Labor to labor advisory board.

3. One representative of employees of the cotton-textile industry to be appointed labor adviser to Government members on cotton-textile code authority.

4. Authority of cotton-textile national relations board to be defined by administrative order to include all subjects mentioned in paragraph 7 hereof. Membership of said board to be increased by one representative of employers and one representative of employees from the cotton-textile industry.

5. If these conditions are accepted I will urge the cotton textile code authority to accept and agree to abide by the foregoing amendment to the industrial relations board provisions.

6. Investigation and reports upon the following questions to be made by N.R.A. division of planning and research in conjunction with revised industrial relations board:

(a) What productive machine hours are necessary to meet normal demand (within 10 days)?

(b) What increase, if any, in wage rates is possible (within 14 days)?

(c) Have wage differentials above the minimum been maintained (within 30 days)?

(d) What changes have taken place in man-hour productivity?

(e) The division of planning and research to cooperate with the industrial relations board in completing its studies of the work load for the use of the board in dealing with all controversies over the stretch-out or specialization system.

7. The cotton-textile industrial relations board will continue to handle all pending or future claims and complaints of discrimination, representation, inaccurate entries on pay envelopes, unwarranted reductions in classification, increased stretch-out, alleged violation of section 7 (a) and all other alleged violations of the code.

8. The seasonal character of the cotton-textile business and the necessity for temporary reductions in machine hours from time to time is recognized by the representatives of the labor organizations.

EXTENSION OF TEMPORARY PLAN FOR DEPOSIT INSURANCE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the bill to amend the Federal Reserve Act, being Senate bill 3025. It will, I think, take but a few moments.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the adoption of the motion will not displace the pending unfinished business, the motion of the Senator from Florida having relation to a privileged report.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no objection to the consideration of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3025) to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act is amended—

"(1) By striking out 'July 1, 1934' wherever it appears in subsections (e), (l), and (y), and inserting in lieu thereof 'July 1, 1935';

"(2) By striking out 'June 15, 1934' where it appears in the last sentence of the third paragraph of subsection (y) and inserting in lieu thereof 'October 1, 1934';

"(3) By striking out 'June 30, 1934' where it appears in the first sentence of the fifth paragraph of subsection (y), and inserting in lieu thereof 'June 30, 1935';

"(4) By amending the second sentence of the fifth paragraph of subsection (y) to comprise two sentences reading as follows: 'The provisions of such subsection (l) relating to State member banks shall be extended for the purposes of this subsection to members of the fund which are not members of the Federal Reserve System, and the provisions of such subsection (l) relating to the appointment of the Corporation as receiver shall be applicable to all members of the fund. The provisions of this subsection shall apply only to deposits of members of the fund which have been made available since March 10, 1933, for withdrawal in the usual course of the banking business.';

"(5) By adding to the sixth paragraph of subsection (y) the following: 'The Corporation shall prescribe by regulations the manner of exercise of the right of nonmember banks to withdraw from membership in the fund on July 1, 1934, except that no bank shall be permitted to withdraw unless 10 days prior thereto it has given written notice to the Corporation of its election so to do. Banks which withdraw from the fund on July 1, 1934, shall be entitled to a refund of their proportionate share of any estimated balance in the fund on the same basis as if the fund had terminated on July 1, 1934.';

"(6) By adding to the end of the fourth paragraph of subsection (y) the following new paragraphs:

"'On and after July 1, 1934, the amount eligible for insurance under this subsection for the purposes of the October 1, 1934 certified statement, any entrance assessment, and, if levied, the additional assessment, shall be the amounts not in excess of $5,000 of the deposits of each depositor.

"'Each mutual savings bank, unless it becomes subject to the provisions of the preceding paragraph in the manner hereinafter provided, shall be excepted from the operation of the preceding paragraph and for each such bank which is so excepted the amount eligible for insurance under this subsection for the purposes of the October 1, 1934 certified statement, any entrance assessment, and, if levied, the additional assessment, shall be the amounts not in excess of $2,500 for the deposits of each depositor. In the event any mutual savings bank shall be closed on account of inability to meet its deposit liabilities the Corporation shall pay not more than $2,500 on account of the net approved claim of any owner of deposits in such bank: Provided, however, That should any mutual savings bank make manifest to the Corporation its election to be subject to the provisions of the preceding paragraph the Corporation may, in the discretion of the board of directors, permit such bank to become so subject and the insurance of its deposits to continue on the same basis and to the same extent as that of fund members other than mutual savings banks.

"'The Corporation, in the discretion of the board of directors, may open on its books solely for the benefit of mutual savings banks an additional Temporary Federal Deposit Insurance Fund (hereinafter referred to as the "Fund For Mutuals") which, if opened, shall become operative on or after July 1, 1934, but prior to August 1, 1934, and shall continue to July 1, 1935. If the Fund For Mutuals is opened on the books of the Corporation, each mutual savings bank which is or becomes entitled to the benefits of insurance during the period of its operation shall be a member thereof and shall not be a fund member. All assessments on each mutual savings bank, including payments heretofore made to the Corporation less an equitable deduction for liabilities and expenses of the fund incurred prior to the opening of the Fund For Mutuals, if opened shall be transferred or paid, as the case may be, to the Fund For Mutuals. All provisions of this section applicable to the fund and not inconsistent with this paragraph shall be applicable to the Fund For Mutuals if opened, except that as to any period the two are in operation the fund shall not be subject to the liabilities of the Fund For Mutuals and the Fund For Mutuals shall not be subject to the liabilities of the fund. Each mutual savings bank admitted to the fund shall bear its equitable share of the liabilities of the fund for the period it is a member thereof, including expenses of operation and allowing for anticipated recoveries.';

"(7) By striking out the period at the end of the first sentence of the fifth paragraph of subsection (y) and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: 'if the member closed on or before June 30, 1934, and not more than $5,000 if closed on or after July 1, 1934.';

"(8) By (a) striking out 'July 1, 1936', in the first sentence of subsection (l) and inserting in lieu thereof 'July 1, 1937', (b) striking out the words 'July 1, 1936' in the seventh paragraph of subsection (y) and inserting in lieu thereof 'July 1, 1937', and (c) adding after the seventh paragraph of subsection (y) the following new paragraph:

"'Until July 1, 1937, any State bank may obtain the benefits of this section on and after the date the fund is terminated upon the conditions with regard to examination, certification, and approval governing the admission of State banks to the fund and upon purchasing such class A stock or making such a deposit as is prescribed in the preceding paragraph for former fund members.'

"(9) By adding at the end of the first paragraph of subsection (v) the following new paragraph:

"'Every insured bank shall display at each place of business maintained by it a sign or signs to the effect that its deposits are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The Corporation shall prescribe by regulation the form of such sign and the manner of its display. Such regulation may impose a maximum penalty of $100 for each day an insured bank continues to violate any lawful provisions of said regulation.'; and

"(10) By amending the first sentence of the second paragraph of subsection (y) by inserting within the parentheses and immediately after the words 'District of Columbia' the words 'and the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska.'

"SEC. 2. The first paragraph of section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 321), is amended by adding after the second sentence thereof a new sentence to read as follows: 'For the purposes of membership of any such bank the terms "capital" and "capital stock" shall include the amount of outstanding capital notes and debentures legally issued by the applying bank and purchased by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.'

"SEC. 3. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended by adding before section 6 thereof the following new section:

"'SEC. 5e. (a) The Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans upon or purchase the assets of any bank, savings bank, or trust company, which has been closed on or after December 31, 1929, and prior to January 1, 1934, and the affairs of which have not been fully liquidated or wound up, upon such terms and conditions as the Corporation may by regulations prescribe. If in connection with the reorganization, stabilization, or liquidation of any such bank, assets have been trusteed or are otherwise held for the benefit of depositors or depositors and others, the authority, subject to regulations, as provided in the preceding sentence, shall be extended for the purpose of authorizing the Corporation to purchase or make loans on such assets held for the benefit of such depositors or depositors and others. This authority shall also extend to any such institution that has reopened without payment of deposits in full. In making any purchase of or loan on the assets of any closed bank, the Corporation shall appraise such assets in anticipation of an orderly liquidation over a period of years, rather than on the basis of forced selling values in a period of business depression. This authority shall also extend to assets of the character made eligible by this section as security for loans without regard to whether the Corporation has heretofore made loans thereon.

"'(b) The Corporation shall purchase at par value such debentures or other obligations of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as are authorized to be issued under subsection (o) of section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, upon request of the board of directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, whenever in the judgment of said board additional funds are required for insurance purposes: Provided, That the Corporation shall not purchase or hold at any time said debentures or other obligations in excess of $250,000,000 par value: Provided further, That the proceeds derived from the purchase by the Corporation of any such debentures or other such obligations shall be used by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation solely in carrying out its functions with respect to such insurance.

"'(c) The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by $250,000,000.'

"SEC. 4. So much of section 31 of the Banking Act of 1933 as relates to stock ownership by directors, trustees, or members of similar governing bodies of member banks of the Federal Reserve System, is hereby repealed."

And the House agree to the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what the conferees did with respect to the provisions in the House amendment liberalizing the payments to depositors in closed banks?

Mr. FLETCHER. They authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to closed banks or to purchase the assets of closed banks.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it in different form from what it was prior to the agreement of the conferees?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; there is no difference.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the conference report change the provision with respect to loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in any way?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not. I do not recall any change.

Mr. COUZENS. In other words, the conferees have not liberalized the provision?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, yes; in this case the provisions were liberalized. Under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act they could make loans only on full and adequate security. That is liberalized to the extent that loans may be made on terms extending over a period of time in order to give time to liquidate the assets of closed banks. There is a more liberal basis provided for loans.

Mr. COUZENS. What yardstick is set up for making loans? Was that changed in any way?

Mr. FLETCHER. We agreed to the House provision as to that.

Mr. COUZENS. Is there any change in the maximum of loans permitted to any one bank or industry? The Senator will recall that the act provides, I think, a maximum loan of $90,000,000 to one industry. Was there any change in that respect?

Mr. FLETCHER. There was no change in that part of the bill that I recall. It was liberalized to the extent that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation making the loans will consider them on the basis of long-term liquidation. That is about the only change made.

I will say that the conference report has been agreed to by the House. It is a unanimous report. I shall be glad to answer any further questions about it.

The main features are that the temporary insurance fund provision is extended for 1 year and the amount insured is raised according to the House provision, from $2,500 to $5,000. There is no change in the permanent policy except that the plan is extended for 1 year.

Provision is made to enable State banks to come in and enjoy the benefits of the system provided they qualify before July 1, 1937. Provision is made for eliminating the requirement of the National Banking Act of 1933 whereby in order to qualify as a director the stockholder had to have $2,500 par value of stock. That has been repealed and we now go back to the provisions of the original act.

Those are the particular provisions which are affected by the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Did the conferees have any information before them as to the probable amount of additional loans which would be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the liberalized authority?

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill now provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's borrowing power shall be extended by the amount of $250,000,000. They may invest in the debentures of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation up to $250,000,000 if it shall be needed in order to pay off the depositors.

Mr. COUZENS. Did the conferees take into consideration the appropriation bill passed by the House authorizing the President to use the funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in any manner he chooses?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think no reference was made to that.

Mr. COUZENS. It seems to me there is developing a conflict with respect to the use of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds. Different measures which have been passed have provided for use of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds without having those uses coordinated in any respect. I am wondering where we are drifting with respect to the use of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the question with which we are concerned is whether there will be funds to meet the demands of the depositors. I believe ample provision has been made for that purpose. The assessment on the banks under the temporary fund is 1 percent of the amount of the deposits, one-fourth of which is paid at the beginning when they enter the system and the remaining three-fourths as called for by the insurance corporation. This will furnish resources to the amount of some $400,000,000 for this fund, and in addition to that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can provide for $250,000,000 more. It is thought that will be ample to cover any possible contingency. There is no limit to the assessment on the banks in the permanent fund, and that is a matter which may be taken up within a year, because the plan is extended for a year.

Mr. COUZENS. May I inquire if the funds which the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation are authorized to secure from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are to be repaid?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is an emergency provision in case that fund should be needed. I do not believe they will ever need it at all, but in order to make it safe we provided for the extension of the power of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to enable it to borrow $250,000,000 to put into the fund.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it contemplated that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation will repay that at some time?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

ANNUAL CONSIDERATION OF PERMANENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9410) providing that permanent appropriations be subject to annual consideration and appropriation by Congress, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HAYDEN. I also ask unanimous consent that the clerks be authorized to correct all section and paragraph numbers of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF MINERAL LANDS LEASING ACT OF 1920

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3723) to amend the Mineral Lands Leasing Act of 1920 with reference to oil- or gas-prospecting permits and leases. This is a bill which is in the nature of an emergency measure for drought relief. There is no objection to it. I have consulted Members of the Senate on both sides of the Chamber.

The leasing act authorizing the issuance of oil and gas permits and leases on the public domain does not in its present form authorize the development of water wells, and as a result, valuable supplies of water, discovered in the search for oil, have been shut off. It frequently happens that water rather than oil or gas is found by operators. This bill will make such water available for beneficial use.

Some years ago, on what is known as the "Red Desert" in Wyoming, prospectors under an oil and gas permit drilled to a depth of 2,250 feet but failed to encounter oil. At a depth of 1,750 feet a large flow of water was discovered amounting to approximately 42,000 gallons a day.

The operators deserted the well, but by virtue of the regulations were liable under their drilling bond for the cost of plugging the well. To do this work properly, saving the casing which was in the hole, would, it was estimated, cost about $10,000 more than the salvage value of the casing. The bonding company rather than go to this expense elected to allow the Government to develop the well as a source of water, paying the cost of this work which amounted to something less than $1,400. Although the water is not suitable for domestic purposes it is altogether suitable for stock water and it is now being used for that purpose.

However, under the present law both the oil company and the bonding company could have plugged the well and destroyed its usefulness. This undoubtedly is what would have happened had it not been that the cost of conditioning it as a water well was much less in this instance than that of removing the casing and plugging the well.

The cost of drilling 1,750 feet for water itself would probably have been prohibitive. This bill affords the means whereby these deep wells—and all others, of course—drilled for oil may be put to a beneficial use when water is discovered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming asked unanimous consent the other day for the consideration of the measure, and I objected at the time. Since then I have made some investigation and the Senator from Wyoming has discussed the matter with me. It applies to some of the exhausted oil wells in the oil fields of the West. I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if it may be understood that the measure has been generally agreed to and its consideration will not lead to debate, I shall not object to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business for the purpose of its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3723) to amend the Mineral Lands Leasing Act of 1920 with reference to oil- or gas-prospecting permits and leases, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 1, after the word "valuable", to strike out "for agricultural or domestic use" and insert "and usable at a reasonable cost for agricultural, domestic, and other purposes"; in line 6, after the word "Secretary" to insert, "Provided, That the land on which such well is situated shall be reserved as a water hole under section 10 of the act of December 29, 1916"; in line 18, before the word "disposing", to strike out "selling or otherwise"; in line 18, after the word "water" to insert "for beneficial use on other lands"; on page 3, line 1, before the words "such water" to strike out "purchase or lease" and insert "make beneficial use of"; after line 9 to strike out "(e) Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to water wells which are necessary for operations under any such lease or permit", and to insert in lieu thereof "(e) Nothing in this section shall be construed to restrict operations under any oil or gas lease or permit under any other provision of this act"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain", approved February 25, 1920, as amended, is amended by adding the following new section:

"SEC. 40. (a) All prospecting permits and leases for oil or gas made or issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the condition that in case the permittee or lessee strikes water while drilling instead of oil or gas, the Secretary of the Interior may, when such water is of such quality and quantity as to be valuable and usable at a reasonable cost for agricultural, domestic, or other purposes, purchase the casing in the well at the reasonable value thereof to be fixed under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary: Provided, That the land on which such well is situated shall be reserved as a water hole under section 10 of the act of December 29, 1916.

"(b) In cases where water wells producing such water have heretofore been or may hereafter be drilled upon lands embraced in any prospecting permit or lease heretofore issued under the act of February 25, 1920, as amended, the Secretary may in like manner purchase the casing in such wells.

"(c) The Secretary may make such purchase and may lease or operate such wells for the purpose of producing water and of using the same on the public lands or of disposing of such water for beneficial use on other lands, and where such wells have heretofore been plugged or abandoned or where such wells have been drilled prior to the issuance of any permit or lease by persons not in privity with the permittee or lessee, the Secretary may develop the same for the purposes of this section: Provided, That owners or occupants of lands adjacent to those upon which such water wells may be developed shall have a preference right to make beneficial use of such water.

"(d) The Secretary may use so much of any funds available for the plugging of wells as he may find necessary to start the program provided for by this section, and thereafter he may use the proceeds from the sale or other disposition of such water as a revolving fund for the continuation of such program, and such proceeds are hereby appropriated for such purpose.

"(e) Nothing in this section shall be construed to restrict operations under any oil or gas lease or permit under any other provision of this act."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether the bill is confined to the State of Wyoming, or whether it applies to other States, and if so, to what extent?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this is an amendment to the General Leasing Act. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make use of water wells which are drilled anywhere upon the public domain by operators in search of oil or gas, and place the water at the disposal of farmers and ranchers to be used for the benefit of the public domain. It has the approval of the Department.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNUAL CONSIDERATION OF PERMANENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9410) providing that permanent appropriations be subject to annual consideration and appropriation by Congress, and for other purposes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona whether the pending bill in any manner disturbs the permanent appropriations for aid to the States for agricultural extension work, land-grant colleges, vocational education in agriculture, home economics, and trade and industry.

Mr. HAYDEN. None of those appropriations are in any manner disturbed, and it is so stated in the House report on the bill. The Senate committee went further than the House, not only in no manner affecting the permanent appropriations mentioned by the Senator, but we came to the conclusion that wherever there was a permanent appropriation upon which a State legislature had a right to rely it should not be disturbed.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator for that statement. May I ask the Senator another question? It relates to item 21, on page 6—

Salaries and expenses, Federal Board for Vocational Education (fiscal year) (D–801).

Will the Senator please explain that item?

Mr. HAYDEN. That item very properly should be made an annual appropriation. It is for the salaries and expenses of a bureau operating in Washington. The money disbursed and supervised by that Bureau, which goes to the States, is not disturbed; but there is no reason why the salaries of the members of the Board should be carried in a permanent appropriation.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. On the same page—page 6, in line 16—what is the disposition of the Library of Congress trust fund? What is to be done with it?

Mr. HAYDEN. A trust fund was created by donations of individuals to the Library of Congress. The House proposed to transfer that fund to the Federal Treasury. The committee could not see that such action was proper, because the money was not derived from the taxpayers of the United States. It was a gift to the Library to carry out a trust.

Mr. FESS. So the bill as it now stands, with the amendment, will not disturb that?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; it will leave the trust fund exactly as it is.

Mr. FESS. I think that is very wise, since something like $2,000,000 has come to the Library of Congress in contributions that are to be applied in accordance with the donations. That money surely ought not to be put into the general fund.

Mr. HAYDEN. The committee followed a uniform rule that where the source of a fund was a donation or gift, and in the nature of a trust, the trust should not be disturbed. In such a case as that of the Smithsonian Institution, we did not deem it proper to take funds donated to carry out the purposes of a particular trust, put them in the Treasury of the United States, and then have Congress review each year whether or not the purpose of the gift should be carried out.

Mr. FESS. I think that is a wise decision.

Mr. HAYDEN. For many years, beginning in the early history of the Government, we find instances where appropriations were made for a particular purpose beginning in a particular year, and then a provision that annually thereafter a certain sum of money might be expended for that purpose. That problem has been studied for some time by various committees of the House, but nothing was definitely done until a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations attacked the problem most vigorously during the past year.

I desire to compliment the members of that subcommittee and the members of the House Committee on Appropriations for the care and the diligence and the profound study they gave to this subject. They have done, on the whole, a remarkable piece of work, which the Senate should be glad to approve.

However, when the bill came to the Senate, the Committee on Appropriations deemed it to be only proper that every department of the Government and every independent establishment should be notified that this legislation was pending; and a letter was written to the head of every such department or independent establishment, directing attention to the bill, and asking if there was anything in the bill to which the department or establishment had any objection.

Of course, a large number of departments had no objection at all, but in a number of instances reasons were presented why action taken by the House should not be concurred in by the Senate. The committee held extensive hearings, gave every bureau and every independent establishment full opportunity to be heard, and on the basis of the evidence thus adduced we have reported this bill, which we have amended in a number of particulars.

The two guiding thoughts with respect to amendments to the bill are, first, that where there is an annual appropriation upon which a State has a right to depend, it should be continued as a continuing appropriation, and not made subject to annual review by Congress. In no other way could the legislatures of the various States make their appropriations, which usually match these funds, except upon a definite understanding that certain sums should be available. The second principle is that wherever moneys have been placed in the custody of any institution of the Government in the nature of a trust—money that does not originate from taxation but is in the nature of a gift for the purpose of the trust—we would not disturb trusts of that nature.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. What is the meaning of the numerals after the respective items on page 2 and other pages?

Mr. HAYDEN. The House Committee on Appropriations, in making this very careful study, went through the books of the Treasury Department to find how the accounts were carried in the Treasury; and the symbols that Senators see throughout the bill refer to specific accounts carried on the books of the Treasury Department for ready identification.

With this brief explanation of the bill, I ask to have the bill read for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendments reported by the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 12, before the word "amounts", to insert "in such"; in the same line, after the word "by", to insert "the laws authorizing"; and in line 18, after the name "Treasury", to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That in addition to amounts in lieu of the permanent appropriation 'Meat inspection, Bureau of Animal Industry (fiscal year)' there is authorized to be appropriated such other sums as may be necessary in the enforcement of the meat-inspection laws (U.S.C., title 21, secs. 71 to 96, inclusive): Provided further, That the accounts of receipts and expenditures of the Soldiers' Home at Washington, D.C., shall be audited by the Comptroller General of the United States, and he shall report to Congress any irregularities disclosed", so as to read:

SEC. 2. (a) Effective July 1, 1935, the permanent appropriations under the appropriation titles listed in subsection (b) of this section are repealed, and such portions of any acts as make permanent appropriations to be expended under such accounts are amended so as to authorize, in lieu thereof, annual appropriations from the general fund of the Treasury in identical terms and in such amounts as now provided by the laws authorizing such permanent appropriations, except that any appropriation for "Adjusted losses and contingencies, postal funds", is authorized to be made from the postal revenues. Any unobligated balances remaining in the permanent appropriations under these accounts on June 30, 1935, shall be covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury: Provided, That in addition to amounts in lieu of the permanent appropriation "Meat inspection, Bureau of Animal Industry (fiscal year)" there is authorized to be appropriated such other sums as may be necessary in the enforcement of the meat-inspection laws (U.S.C., title 21, secs. 71 to 96, inclusive): Provided further, That the accounts of receipts and expenditures of the Soldiers' Home at Washington, D.C., shall be audited by the Comptroller General of the United States, and he shall report to Congress any irregularities disclosed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 4, to strike out:

(b) (1) Bequest of Gertrude M. Hubbard, Library of Congress, interest account (0x257).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 6, to strike out:

(2) Expenses of Smithsonian Institution, interest account (0x795).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 16, to strike out:

(8) Soldiers' Home, interest account (8x185).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 5, to strike out:

(13) Refund of excessive duties (Customs) (2x324).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 19, to strike out:

(23) Recoinage of silver coins (2x106).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 11, before the word "Operating" to strike out "(31)" and insert "(26)", and in line 13 to strike out "(8-962.51)" and insert "(8-962.60)" so as to read:

(26) Operating snag and dredge boats on upper Mississippi, Illinois, and Minnesota Rivers (fiscal year) (8-962.60).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 15, to strike out:

(33) Library of Congress trust fund, interest on permanent loan account (0x263).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 17, to insert:

(c) Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make payments on accounts arising under "Allowance or drawback (Internal Revenue) (2x438)", "Redemption of stamps (Internal Revenue) (2x432)", "Refunding legacy taxes, act March 30, 1928 (2x430)", "Allowance or drawback (industrial Alcohol) (2x440)", and "Repayment of taxes on distilled spirits destroyed by casualty (2x431)", from the annual appropriation entitled "Refunding taxes illegally collected."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona to explain that section. I am not interested particularly in the whole section, but I notice at the top of page 7 there seems to be a provision for a continuing appropriation for refunding taxes illegally collected.

Mr. HAYDEN. No, Mr. President; it is not a continuing appropriation. The purpose of the amendment was to make provision so that the payments would be from one fund annually appropriated. Payments are now made from five different accounts, which are to be consolidated into one account, "Refunding taxes illegally collected", and that money is to be annually appropriated by Congress.

Mr. COUZENS. That is the provision of the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; this amendment was requested by the Treasury Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 5, to strike out:

SEC. 8. Effective July 1, 1935, the appropriation account on the books of the Government entitled "Recreation Fund, Army" (8T078) is abolished and the balance thereof shall be covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 8. No portion of the "Recreation Fund, Army", constituted by the War Department Appropriation Act approved March 4, 1933, shall be available for expenditure at any time except in accordance with the terms of any appropriation which may be hereafter made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 14, to strike out:

SEC. 9. Effective July 1, 1935, (a) the naval hospital fund (7S815) is abolished, and any unobligated balance therein, as of that date, shall be covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury; (b) moneys theretofore required by law to be collected and paid into the credit of such fund shall be collected and deposited into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts; and (c) there are hereby authorized to be appropriated from the general fund of the Treasury, commencing with the fiscal year 1936, for the purposes of the same character as those for which such naval hospital fund was available prior to July 1, 1935, such sums as annually may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 10. Effective July 1, 1935, all sums received from fines and forfeitures imposed by naval courts martial shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and, commencing with the fiscal year 1936, there are authorized to be appropriated from the general fund of the Treasury annually such sums as may be necessary to meet the character of expenses which, prior to July 1, 1935, were chargeable to the account entitled "Navy Fines and Forfeitures (7S984)." Any unobligated balance in such account, as of July 1, 1935, shall be covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, there is an inconsistency between the amendment offered by the committee on page 17 and the text itself. In order to take the matter to conference, I move that section 12, page 17, line 1, be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 11, after the word "from", to strike out "assessments authorized to be made against national banks to cover the cost of salaries and expenses of national-bank examiners, contingent expenses of the national currency, and for the salaries of Deputy Comptrollers of the Currency and other personnel in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and the amounts received from", so as to read:

SEC. 11. Effective July 1, 1935, the amounts received from assessments authorized to be made against the Federal home-loan banks for salaries and expenses of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and assessments on carriers under section 14 of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of June 16, 1933, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Commencing with the fiscal year 1938 there are authorized to be appropriated annually, from the general fund of the Treasury, such sums as may be necessary to defray the cost of such activities.

SEC. 18. (a) Effective July 1, 1935, the appropriation accounts appearing on the books of the Government and listed in subsection (b) of this section, as well as appropriation accounts bearing similar titles on the books of the Government, are abolished, and any unobligated balances under such accounts as of June 30, 1935, shall be covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury. Any appropriations, to which expenditures under such accounts have been chargeable theretofore, are repealed. On July 1, 1935, there shall be established on the books of the Government an account to be designated "Refund of moneys erroneously received and covered", and there is authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to meet any expenditures of the character now chargeable to the appropriation accounts herein abolished and other collections erroneously received and covered which are not properly chargeable to any other appropriation. The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit with his annual estimates of appropriations an amount necessary to meet expenditures properly chargeable to this account.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 19, after "Sec.", to strike out "21" and insert "19"; and in line 25, after the word "to", to strike out "approximately" and insert "appropriately", so as to read:

SEC. 19. Effective July 1, 1935, moneys received as: Patent Office fees; unearned moneys, lands (Interior Department); reentry permit fees (Labor Department); naturalization fees (Labor Department); and registry fees (Labor Department); and held in the official checking accounts of disbursing officers, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to appropriately designated trust-fund accounts and shall be available for refunds and for transfer of the earned portions thereof into appropriate receipt-fund titles on the books of the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 12, after "Sec.", to strike out "22" and insert "20", and in line 17, after the word "moneys", to insert a comma and "except moneys received by the Comptroller of the Currency or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation", so as to read:

SEC. 20. (a) The funds appearing on the books of the Government and listed in subsection (b) of this section shall be classified on the books of the Treasury as trust funds. All moneys accruing to these funds are hereby appropriated, and shall be disbursed in compliance with the terms of the trust. Hereafter moneys, except moneys received by the Comptroller of the Currency or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, received by the Government as trustee analogous to the funds named in subsection (b) of this section shall likewise be deposited into the Treasury as trust funds with appropriate title, and all amounts credited to such trust-fund accounts are hereby appropriated and shall be disbursed in compliance with the terms of the trust.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 1, after the word "trust", to strike out "funds" and insert "fund"; in line 2, after "(8T184)", to strike out "and "Policemen and Firemen's Relief Fund, District of Columbia" (DCt614)", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That, effective July 1, 1935, expenditures from the trust fund "Soldiers' Home, Permanent Fund" (8T184) shall be made only in pursuance of appropriations annually made by Congress, and such appropriations are hereby authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 24, to strike out:

SEC. 27. The Comptroller General of the United States shall cause a survey to be made of all inactive and permanent appropriations and/or funds on the books of the Government and also funds in the official custody of officers and employees of the United States, in which the Government is concerned, for which no accounting is rendered to the General Accounting Office; and he shall submit to the Congress annually, in a special report, his recommendations for such changes in existing law relating thereto as, in his judgment, may be in the public interest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 14, to insert the following additional section:

SEC. 26. In addition to the regular estimates the President is authorized to submit to the Congress, for the fiscal years 1936 and 1937, in the annual budget for any department, independent establishment, bureau, or office, estimates of appropriations in alternate form whenever in his judgment such action would result in greater economy and efficiency in the control and use of public funds.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD in connection with the new section 26 a letter which I addressed to the Director of the Budget and his reply thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 21, 1934.

Hon. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS,
Director of the Budget, Washington, D.C.

DEAR LEW: The act of June 22, 1906 (34 Stat. 448), provides that the estimates for expenses of the Government shall be prepared and submitted each year according to the order and arrangement of the appropriations acts for the year preceding.

In order that there may be authority to effect economies and establish better budgetary control of estimates by the arrangement of appropriations, I have introduced the enclosed amendment to the bill H.R. 9410, known as the "Permanent Appropriations Repeal Act, 1934", to authorize, in addition to the regular estimates, the submission to Congress for legislative consideration of alternate estimates of appropriations in such form and arrangement as may be deemed proper by the President.

I am sure that it is your desire that the Budget estimates as submitted shall contain complete information for the benefit of the Committees on Appropriation of the House and Senate. I am also sure that you are as much opposed as I am to lump-sum appropriations which may be juggled about and diverted to other than the uses that Congress intended. However, if you believe that a provision along the lines indicated in my amendment would be advantageous, I shall be glad to urge that such provision be attached to H.R. 9410, which is now under consideration by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. Your views on the proposed amendment will therefore be greatly appreciated.

With best wishes, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

CARL HAYDEN.

BUDGET BUREAU,
May 22, 1934.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CARL: I have read with interest your letter of May 21, with which you enclosed a copy of the amendment you intend to propose to bill H.R. 9410.

I am in full agreement with the intention of this proposed amendment, but believe that you will readily appreciate the desirability of slightly amending the wording thereof so as to free it from any possible construction of requiring the preparation of alternate forms of estimates of appropriations. The preparation of alternate forms of the estimates is something which must be approached gradually, and I think that it would be better if the language of the proposed amendment were slightly changed so as to avoid conveying any other thought.

I am returning herewith the copy of the proposed amendment which accompanied your letter, and have indicated thereon the changes which I suggest be made.

Very truly yours,

L. W. DOUGLAS, Director.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on page 11, to strike out line 3, and to insert the same on page 30, after line 3. It is a transfer of an item from one part of the bill to another.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, to strike out line 3, as follows:

(4) Relief of the indigent, Alaska fund (2s108).

And to insert the same on page 36, after line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer the following committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 27, lines 7 and 8, to strike out the words "and donations", so as to read:

SEC. 19. Effective July 1, 1935, moneys received as: Patent Office fees; unearned moneys, lands (Interior Department); reentry permit fees (Labor Department); naturalization fees (Labor Department); and registry fees (Labor Department); and held in the official checking accounts of disbursing officers, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to appropriately designated trust-fund accounts and shall be available for refunds, and for transfer of the earned portions thereof into appropriate receipt fund titles on the books of the Government: Provided, That any other unearned moneys carried in official checking accounts of disbursing officers or other accountable officers (including clerks and marshals of United States district courts), including quasi-public moneys administered by officers of the United States by virtue of their official capacity, shall be deposited similarly into the Treasury as trust funds and are hereby made available for disbursement under the terms of the trust.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer another committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 27, line 21, after the word "section", to insert the words "and not otherwise herein provided for", so as to read:

SEC. 20. (a) The funds appearing on the books of the Government and listed in subsection (b) of this section shall be classified on the books of the Treasury as trust funds. All moneys accruing to these funds are hereby appropriated, and shall be disbursed in compliance with the terms of the trust. Hereafter moneys, except moneys received by the Comptroller of the Currency or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, received by the Government as trustee analogous to the funds named in subsection (b) of this section and not otherwise herein provided for shall likewise be deposited into the Treasury as trust funds with appropriate title, and all amounts credited to such trust-fund accounts are hereby appropriated and shall be disbursed in compliance with the terms of the trust:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, which I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, to strike out lines 9 and 10, as follows:

(b) (1) To promote the education of the blind (interest) (2x093).

And to insert the matter stricken out on page 36, after line 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2347) to amend the Inland Waterways Corporation Act, approved June 3, 1924, as amended.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 9178. An act to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia; and

H.J.Res. 322. Joint resolution to provide for the disposal of smuggled merchandise, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to require imported articles to be marked in order that smuggled merchandise may be identified, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H.R. 9178. An act to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H.J.Res. 322. Joint resolution to provide for the disposal of smuggled merchandise, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to require imported articles to be marked in order that smuggled merchandise may be identified, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

IN AID OF INDIANS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3645) to conserve and develop Indian lands and resources, to establish a credit system for Indians, to provide for higher education for Indians, to extend toward Indians the right to form business and other organizations, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WHEELER obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Is this bill of general application to Indians throughout the country?

Mr. WHEELER. It is.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bailey	Black	Bulkley
Ashurst	Bankhead	Bone	Bulow
Austin	Barbour	Borah	Byrd
Bachman	Barkley	Brown	Byrnes

Fletcher	Lewis	Robinson, Ark.	White
Frazier	Logan	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TYDINGS in the chair). Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is stated briefly in the report submitted by the Committee on Indian Affairs. This bill has the approval of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, of the Interior Department, and also has the approval of the Bureau of the Budget. The President himself has sent a letter stating that he desires to have the bill passed.

The purposes of the bill are as follows:

First, to stop the alienation, through action by the Government or the Indian, of such lands, belonging to ward Indians, as are needed for the present and future support of the Indians.

With respect to that, I will say that heretofore there has been pursued a policy whereby the Indians would get patents and fees to the lands, which would then be disposed of, and the Indians would find themselves without land and pauperized.

The second purpose is to provide for the acquisition, through purchase, of land for Indians now landless who are anxious and fitted to make a living on such land. The Committee on Indian Affairs and the Bureau of Indian Affairs have found that there are many Indians who have no lands whatsoever, and are unable to make a living. Consequently, the Government is constantly compelled to furnish money to these Indians; and it is thought by the Government that it would be much cheaper in the long run and would make better citizens of them if we could put them on small tracts of land where they could make their own living.

The third purpose of the bill is to stabilize the tribal organization of Indian tribes by vesting such tribal organizations with real, though limited, authority, and by prescribing conditions which must be met by such tribal organizations.

This provision will apply only if a majority of the Indians on any Indian reservation desire this sort of organization. As a matter of fact, however, it does not change to any great extent the present tribal organization, except that when a majority of the Indians want to establish this tribal organization and extend the provisions of the bill to it, they may do so.

The bill also provides that Indian tribes may equip themselves with the devices of modern business organization through forming themselves into business corporations. On some of the reservations the Indians are conducting fishing businesses, and on others they are conducting timber businesses. On other reservations they are conducting some other businesses. The bill provides that when a majority of the Indians on a reservation desire to form a corporation for the transaction of their business, they may do so in the manner prescribed in the bill.

The next provision is for the purpose of establishing a system of financial credit for Indians; that is, a revolving fund whereby the Government may loan to individual Indians in certain cases, and to the tribal organizations or the Indian corporations, certain money in the event that the Secretary of the Interior thinks they are worthy of such loans.

Then there is a provision to supply Indians with means for collegiate and technical training in the best schools. On many of the Indian reservations there are exceedingly bright, capable Indians who, as wards of the Government, are unable to get a higher education at the present time. There is no provision in the Interior Department by which the Department can make loans or provide funds to the Indians for such education.

The bill also has a provision to open the way for qualified Indians to hold positions in the Federal Indian Service on the Indian reservations. At the present time, by reason of the civil-service rules and regulations, we find that competent Indians are absolutely unable to take or hold positions in the Indian Service. For instance, we find many instances where Indian girls have graduated from a nursing school, are graduate nurses, but are unable to be employed in the Indian Service because of the fact that they have not had sufficient training outside, and they are unable to get the training because of the fact that most white training institutions would not give the Indian girls an opportunity to act as nurses in those institutions.

Likewise with regard to their timber, the rules and regulations of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the civil service have been such that it has been necessary to employ white men to do the Indian work when there were Indians who were thoroughly competent to carry on their own business.

As an illustration of that let me call attention to the fact that the Indians on the Klamath Reservation, as well as on the White River Reservation and other reservations, have grown up in the timber business; and notwithstanding the fact that they knew the timber business probably as well as any white man, yet because of the fact that they have had no college education they were not permitted to be employed even as scalers of their own timber. The result has been that the Indians have been given no opportunity to handle their own affairs or to be trained in their own affairs. This bill, we think, gives them the opportunity to which they are entitled.

My observation has been that while the Government has been seeking to train the Indians of the United States, as a matter of fact most of them are in a much more deplorable condition economically than they ever have been in their lives. In many instances they have lost their land. They have not been given an opportunity to work their own timber or to use their own resources. We have pauperized them, and in many cases taken them to schools where we have given them an education which did not fit them for the work upon the reservation.

There is nothing in the bill as presented to the Senate which in any wise gives the Department of the Interior the right to impose its will upon the Indians on any reservation. If a majority of the Indians wish to have a corporation for the conduct of their own affairs, they may do so. If they want to establish tribal councils for the purpose of conducting their own affairs, they may do so. The bill originally presented by the Department of the Interior contained some provisions which were compulsory in character. The Committee on Indian Affairs eliminated all those compulsory provisions and eliminated from the bill as originally presented the right of the Indians to make laws upon the reservations.

As the bill now stands before the Senate the committee have given it long and careful consideration, and we feel that its enactment will be of great benefit to the Indians and in the long run will be much less costly than the present system to the Government of the United States. I feel that what we ought to be working for with reference to the Indians is eventually to abolish entirely the Indian Bureau, through which and on which we are spending millions of dollars. This bill is a step in that direction by seeking to impose upon the Indians self-government in their own affairs. I hope that the bill will pass.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. In the light of the last statement made by the able Senator from Montana, may I inquire if his appraisal of the bill meets the statements which have been made to me and which I am about to mention? I have been told that this bill may perpetuate the Indian Bureau, and that the Indian Bureau has been very anxious for a measure of this character, fearing that the life of that organization might be ended in the near future should the Indians take upon themselves the responsibilities of citizenship, much as they have taken upon themselves those responsibilities in the State of Oklahoma. I am told further that in the State of Oklahoma the Indians and those representing the Indians have declined to come under the terms of the bill because they feel that it superimposes upon the Indians for an indefinite period the harsh bureaucratic system of government under which the Indians for a century or more have been controlled.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator there is not a provision in this bill which superimposes upon the Indians bureaucratic control from Washington. On the contrary, this bill proposes to give the Indians an opportunity to take over the control of their own resources and fit them as American citizens. The bill as it originally came from the Department had many objectionable features, which were eliminated from it. Many of the Indians throughout the country were opposed to the original bill, and the committee was opposed to it, and amended it, so, as it is now framed, the Indian Bureau cannot impose its will upon the Indians in any case; but the vote of a majority of the Indians is required. If the Indians form a corporation or otherwise come within the provisions of this bill, if they want to change that status, they may do so.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. DILL. I have not had time carefully to study the bill, but I have had a great many complaints about it from Indians in my State.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator from Washington, because I have had similar complaints, that the complaints were against the bill as originally introduced and not against the bill which is now presented.

Mr. DILL. I notice in section 10 that on petition of one-fourth of the adult Indians the Secretary of Interior may issue a charter of incorporation to a tribe.

Mr. WHEELER. The provision reads:

> The Secretary of the Interior may, upon petition by at least one-fourth of the adult Indians, issue a charter of incorporation to such tribe: Provided, That such charter shall not become operative until ratified at a special election by a majority vote of the adult Indians living on the reservation.

In other words, upon the petition of one-fourth of the Indians, the Secretary of the Interior shall offer a charter, which will have to be ratified by a majority of the Indians of the reservation.

Mr. DILL. I have very strong representations from one of the tribes in my State, namely, the Yakimas, who have a large amount of property, asking that I interpose an amendment providing that they shall be exempted from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not press such an amendment, for the reason that unless a majority of the Indians on the Yakima Reservation want the provisions of this bill, then there is nothing in the world that can bring them within its provisions. As the bill originally came to the committee the Department could compel the Indians, whether or not they wanted to do so, to come within many of its provisions. That was eliminated by the committee. I will say further to the Senator that probably all the objections which were raised by the Indians on the Yakima Reservation and by Indians from other portions of the country with regard to the provisions of the bill have been eliminated.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. McCARRAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. In connection with the matter the Senator was just discussing, he will recall that yesterday I presented to him a letter from the Six Nations. I inquire if the Senator has that letter?

Mr. WHEELER. I have.

Mr. COPELAND. I have in my hand a letter which I just received from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in which he says that the Indians in my State—the Six Nations—are unacquainted with the provisions of the bill as the Senator from Montana has now presented it. The Commissioner states:

> They are still thinking of the bill as originally introduced, which has been entirely superseded by the bill which the Senate Indian Committee reported.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. The Commissioner goes on to say:

> The actual bill—

That is, the bill as presented—> would leave the New York tribes altogether undisturbed except in the following particulars:

May I refer to them?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. The first one is:

> (1) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $10,000,000 revolving-loan fund, which the bill creates.

Is that correct?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. The letter continues:

> (2) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $2,000,000 land-purchase fund, which the bill creates.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. The next particular is:

> (3) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $250,000 a year for scholarships for the higher education of Indians, which the bill creates.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. The fourth particular is:

> (4) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $250,000 a year for the expenses of tribal organizations, which the bill creates.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. The fifth particular is:

> (5) If they wanted it, they could secure a Federal charter for their existing corporate organization as tribes.

But all these things, as I understand, are optional with the Indians?

Mr. WHEELER. They are entirely optional.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is that true in the case of all tribes?

Mr. WHEELER. That is so in the case of all tribes.

Mr. COPELAND. The bill, in section 17, as I understand, expressly leaves unaffected any claim or suit by an Indian tribe against the United States?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Then the Commissioner tells me that the bill is of vital importance to the Indians outside of New York State. So, if I am correctly informed—and I ask that this letter may be inserted in the RECORD—so far as the Indians of New York State are concerned, they are unaffected by the bill if they choose not to be affected by it?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct. That is not only true of the Indians of New York but it is true of the Indians on every reservation throughout the country.

Mr. COPELAND. And, conversely, of course, if they choose to take advantage of the provisions of the bill, they are at liberty to do so?

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter referred to by the Senator from New York will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., June 12, 1934.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: The Wheeler-Howard Indian bill, I understand, will be called up today. I have just conferred with spokesmen of the Six Nations of New York, and find them opposed to the bill, but unacquainted with its provisions. They are still thinking of the bill as originally introduced, which has been entirely superseded by the bill which the Senate Indian Committee reported.

The actual bill would leave the New York tribes altogether undisturbed except in the following particulars:

(1) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $10,000,000 revolving-loan fund, which the bill creates.

(2) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $2,000,000 land-purchase fund, which the bill creates.

(3) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $250,000 a year for scholarships for the higher education of Indians, which the bill creates.

(4) If they wanted it, they could have access to the $250,000 a year for the expenses of tribal organizations, which the bill creates.

(5) If they wanted it, they could secure a Federal charter for their existing corporate organization as tribes.

All of the above will be optional with them.

The bill in section 17 expressly leaves unaffected any claim or suit, by any tribe, against the United States.

The enormous importance of the bill is for those Indians, not in New York State, who have been rendered landless by the allotment system. They number 150,000 and are victims of a stubborn error on the part of Congress and the administration. They, if the bill be passed, can be put back on land of their own and capitalized for the development of their own land and supplied with educational advantages.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN COLLIER, Commissioner.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, preliminary to the suggestion of an amendment to section 10, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether or not there are any safeguards or provisions in the bill whereby Federal agencies, such as we now know exist, may be limited in their control of the affairs of Indians? In other words, to be explicit, I have known instances where the Federal superintendent or the Federal agent has had absolute control because he gave out the blankets, he gave out the food, and he gave out everything else, so that if one wanted to talk to the Indians of a particular reservation he had to go to the superintendent, and if he did not have the superintendent's permission, in all probability he would not have the favorable consideration of the Indians of that particular agency. I am wondering, because I know the Senator from Montana is as much interested in these matters as I am, if there are sufficient safeguards in the bill so that the Indian agents may not wield their powerful influence over the Indians of any particular tribe to compel them to yield to their will?

Mr. WHEELER. I will reply to the Senator. I appreciate that what he says has been true in the past. For many years the Indian agent located upon an Indian reservation was a czar. There was a time when he could keep a white man even from going upon a reservation or stepping his foot upon it. He could drive anybody off the reservation if he did not like the color of his hair, and so forth. That, however, has been eliminated, so that at the present time anybody can go upon any of the Indian reservations unless it happens to be a closed reservation, and I know of no such reservation at the present time.

This bill, however, seeks to get away from the bureaucratic control of the Indian Department, and it seeks further to give the Indians the control of their own affairs and of their own property; to put it in the hands either of an Indian council or in the hands of a corporation to be organized by the Indians. I, myself, think that this bill, as now presented, is the greatest step forward the Department has ever taken with reference to Indians. It is inconceivable to me that any Indian who is not influenced by some white man who does not want to have the privileges of this measure extended to the Indians or who is not influenced by the Indian bureaucracy should be opposed to this bill. I say that because it has been found that in many instances the very people of whom the Senator is speaking were opposed to this bill for the reason that they felt their control over the Indians was going to be lost and that they might also lose their jobs because competent Indians would be put in their places.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then, I want to ask, if I do not unduly interrupt the Senator, and with his permission, with respect to section 10, from which I read as follows:

> The Secretary of the Interior may, upon the petition by at least one-fourth of the adult Indians, issue a charter of incorporation to such tribe.

I am wondering now, having in mind the percentages we have been using for various purposes for our own guidance, if that percentage should not be raised, and I respectfully suggest 51 percent.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me suggest that the Senator read further on in the section. The provision he has read simply means that when one-fourth of the Indians present to the Secretary of the Interior a petition asking for a charter, he will issue the charter, but it must be voted upon and approved by a majority of the Indians before it may become effective. We expressly put that provision in the bill. Then it is also provided that if the Indians want to rescind their action they can do so; I think it requires a two-thirds vote. That is provided in another section of the bill, so that the majority of the Indians on the reservation control the election in that respect; and as to other action which may be taken under this bill, it is exactly the same as the white people do in the various States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I think that this is the fourth or fifth draft of this bill. To one of the earlier drafts I submitted an amendment, which was agreed to, but in a subsequent draft I think the entire section which embraced my amendment was eliminated.

My State is different from the other Indian States. There are in Oklahoma approximately 150,000 Indians. These Indians form about 36 distinct bands, and there are remnants or stragglers of some 20 bands attached to some of the other bands. We have in Oklahoma 52 separate and distinct tribes of Indians. Our Indian reservations have heretofore been allotted, and there are left in Oklahoma no great Indian reservations save the Osage Reservation, and that has been practically allotted as well.

Mr. President, section 5 of the bill provides for the appropriation of $2,000,000 a year for the purpose of acquiring additional lands for Indian reservations. I offered an amendment at one of the committee meetings to provide that the money should be used not only to buy lands for Indian reservations but that the money should be available to buy lands for individual Indians.

In my State we do not want any more Indian reservations. We have enough. Our Indians are already on reservations, so to speak, though they have been allotted. Some of our Indians have lost their lands, it is true.

So far as I am concerned, I want the bill amended, if that be possible, so as to provide that the money shall be available not only to buy lands for additions to Indian reservations but to buy lands for individual Indians. There is no chance to place them on reservations. They are living along the creeks in tepees and in tents. I want the money available to buy lands not only in my State for individual Indians but in other States where Indian lands have been allotted.

Mr. WHEELER. There is no question that the bill does provide for the purchase of lands for individual Indians.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have not found the language sufficiently broad for that purpose.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me invite the attention of the Senator to the language of section 5, as follows:

> The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to acquire, through purchase, relinquishment, gift, exchange, or assignment, any interest in lands, water rights, or surface rights to lands, within or without existing reservations, including trust or otherwise restricted allotments, whether the allottee be living or deceased, for the purpose of providing land for Indians.

It is not for Indian tribes, but for both tribes and individual Indians.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then, to make that sufficiently clear, I suggest, on page 4, line 1, after the word "tribe", that there be inserted the words "or individual Indians." That is exactly as the Senator from Montana understands and as I understand, and I think the amendment will conform to the understanding we had in the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 1, after the word "tribe", it is proposed to insert "or individual Indians," so as to make the sentence read:

Title to any lands or rights acquired pursuant to this act shall be taken in the name of the United States in trust for the Indian tribes or individual Indians for which the land is acquired, and such lands or rights shall be exempt from State and local taxation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in section 15 I have sought to exclude the Indians of my State from the operation of some sections of the bill. The bill proposes to extend the restrictions to all Indians forever. That would mean that many millions of acres of land in my State would never become taxable.

At this time, without conferring with the Indians of Oklahoma, I am unwilling to agree that they shall come under the provision, so I have exempted them. During the coming summer, if the bill shall pass now, I will confer with the several tribes in my State. If those Indian tribes desire to come under the provision, then I may come back at the next session and move to amend the section by striking from it such tribes as want to be eliminated. I make that statement in fairness to the Indians of my State. Otherwise I have no objection.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wish to concur in the statement of the learned Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] and to state, as regards the Indians of the State of Nevada, that I may join with him at a later time to have them eliminated from the provisions of the bill, if they so desire.

With the permission of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] I wish to make a suggestion with reference to section 10. I desire to offer an amendment, on page 6, line 6, to strike out the words "one-fourth", and to insert in lieu thereof "one-third." In other words, I have in mind that it should be 51 percent who shall apply, but I think as a fair compromise between the two one-third would be fair.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that it is only upon request of one-fourth that a charter may be issued, and they do not do the voting. I have no objection to fixing it at one-third, but I think it will complicate the situation rather than help it. If one-fourth of the Indians petition the Government and say "We should like to have this done", then one-half of the entire number of adult Indians have to vote on it before it may be done; and it would seem to me that is all that should be necessary.

Mr. McCARRAN. I want to explain to the Senator why I propose to increase the percentage. I think he has in mind the very thing I have in mind, of which I have personal and intimate knowledge. In other words, we might control one-fourth of the Indians and have them in the hollow of our hand if we were agents or superintendents, whereas if we raised the percentage a little bit perchance we would have an element of independence involved which no agent could control.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no particular objection to the proposal of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

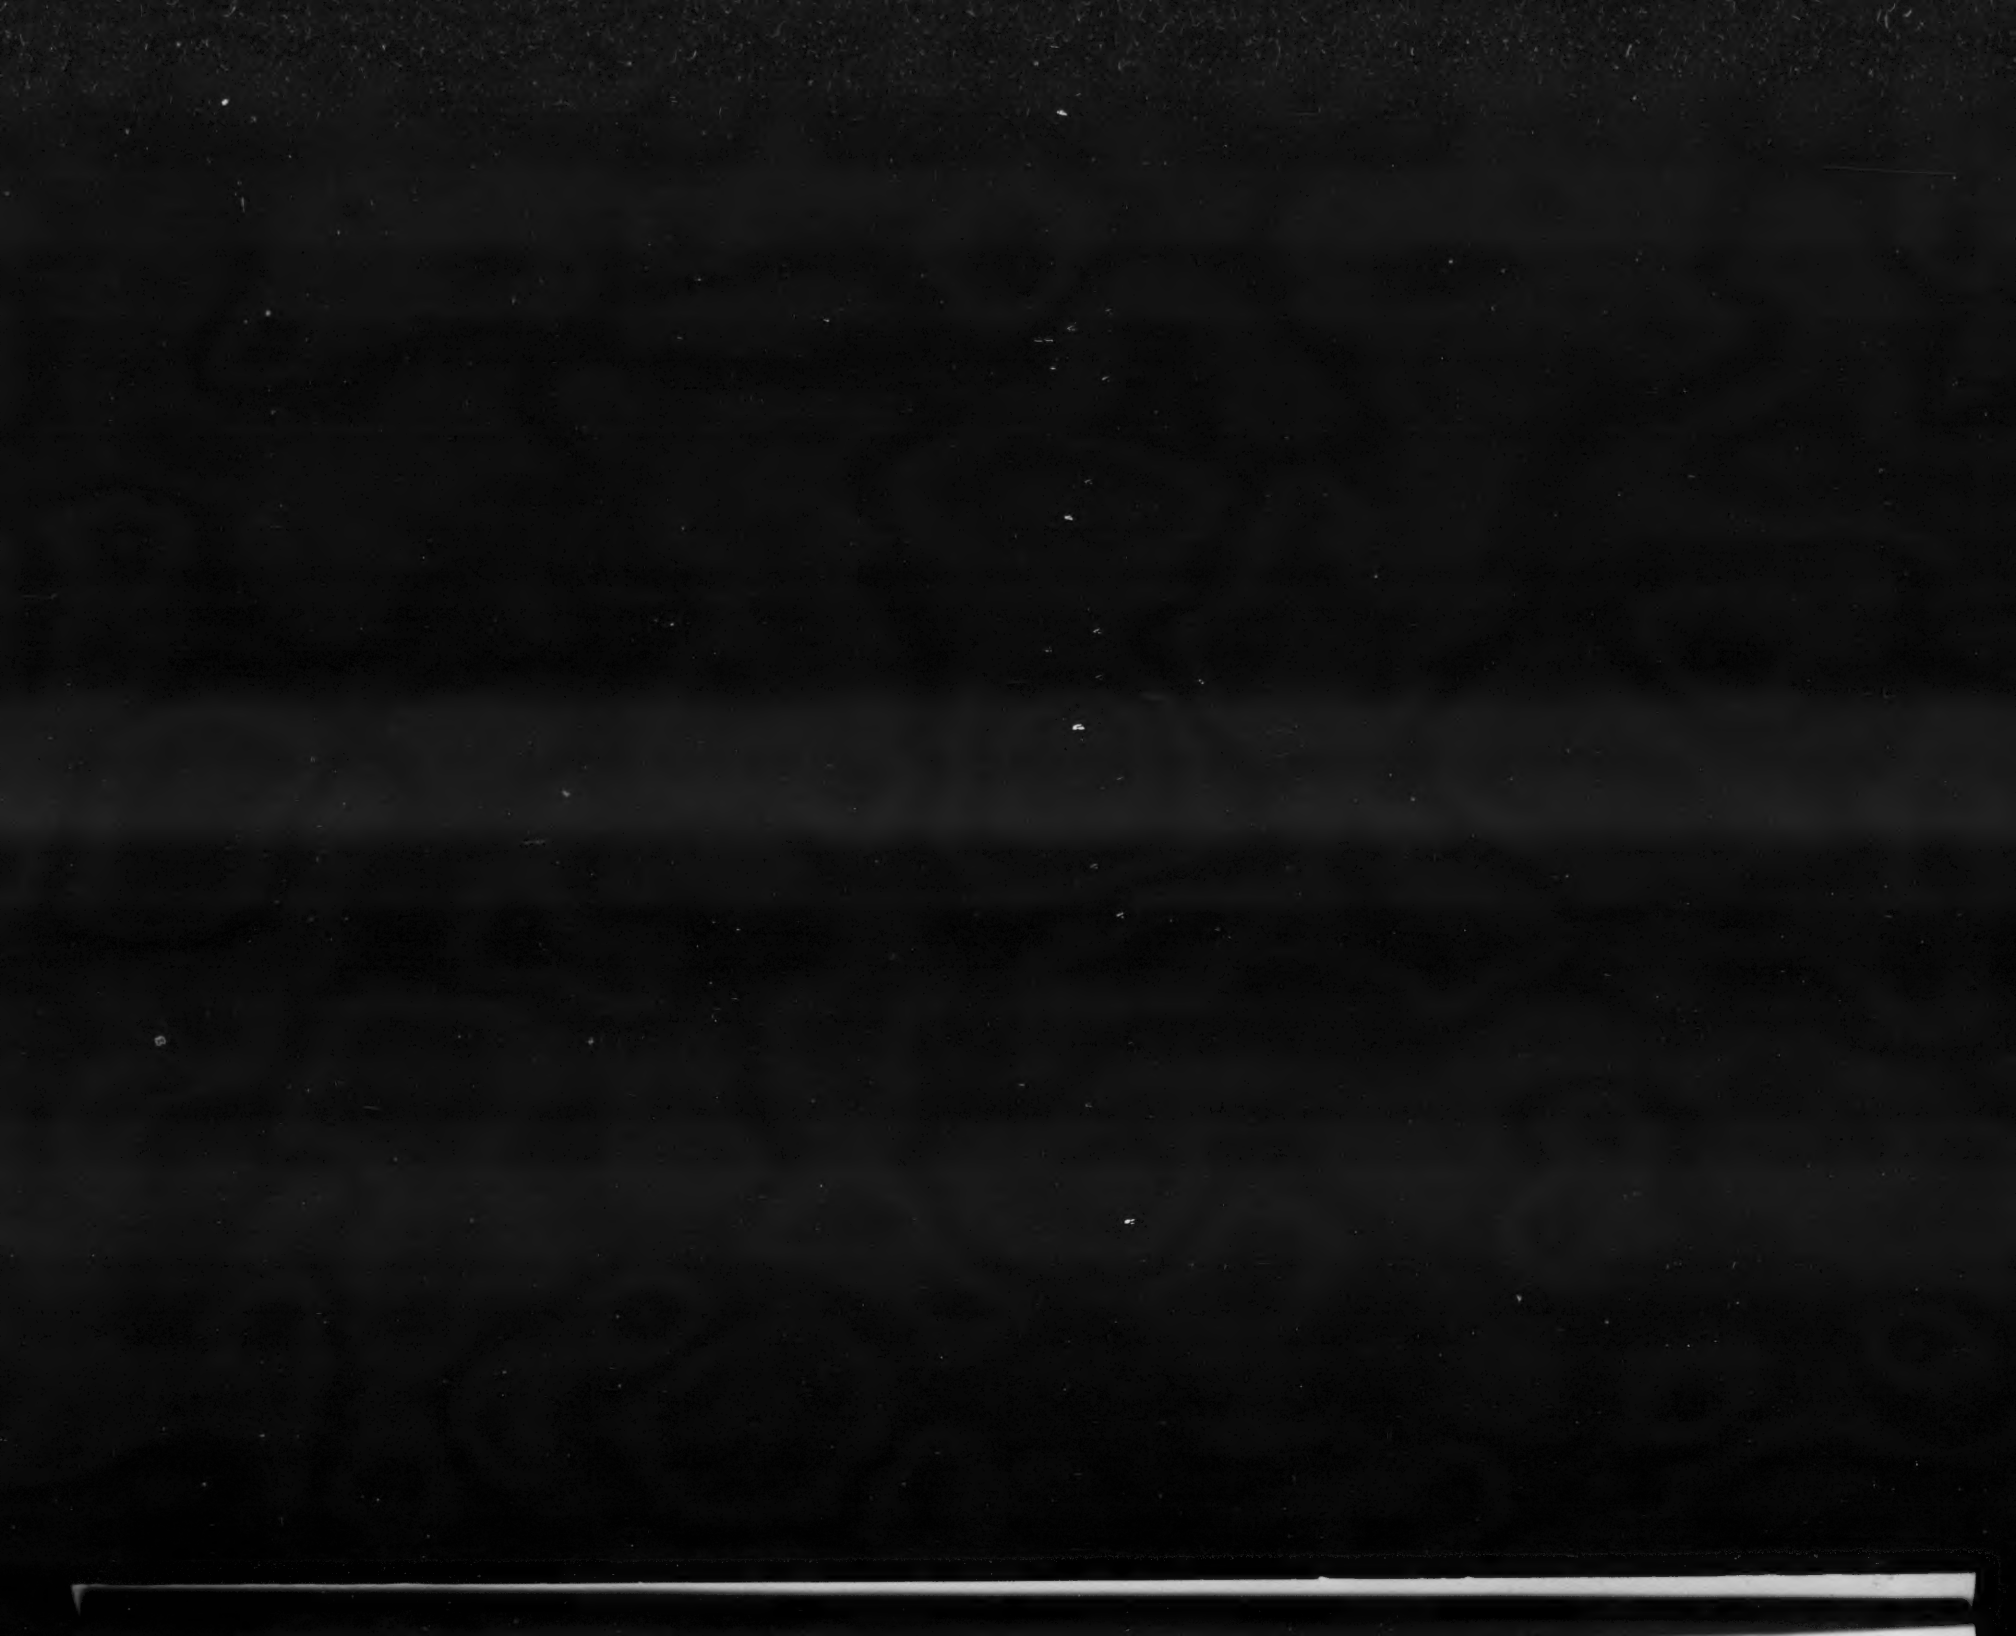
The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 6, it is proposed to strike out "one-fourth" and insert "one-third", so as to make the sentence read:

The Secretary of the Interior may, upon petition by at least one-third of the adult Indians, issue a charter of incorporation to such tribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, for a number of years, as Senators may recall, I have been endeavoring to secure legislation which would protect and preserve the Indians and prevent the dissipating of their property. Upon many occasions I have called attention to the fact that though the number of Indians was diminishing the costs of operating the Indian Bureau were constantly increasing. I presented incontrovertible evidence to the Government that the policies of the Government in dealing with the Indians were unjust and if persisted in would rob them of their property, if it did not lead to their extinction. I called attention to investigations made by various committees of Congress, which demonstrated that the treatment of the Indians could not be justified upon any rational, humane, or just grounds. Hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property belonging to Indians have been taken from them either by treaties, in which the Indians were overreached, or by unwise, injudicious, and indefensible policies and procedure by representatives of the Government, including the Indian Bureau.

The record of our Government's dealings with the Indians is a dark and discreditable one. The Indians, I repeat, have been robbed of hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property, real and personal. During the past few years funds which were under the control of the Indian Bureau and which belonged to the Indians have been drawn upon until now, I think, the aggregate is less than $25,000,000, and charges exist against the same which would completely absorb them.



I remember at the last session of Congress it was demonstrated that more than 51 percent of the very large appropriations made by Congress for the support and benefit of the Indians were absorbed in meeting the salaries of a vast army of Federal employees. My recollection is there was 1 employee to every 25 Indians, and on some of the reservations the employees constituted one-eighth of the Indians. The Indians have been plundered by the Government and have been the victims of unjust treatment by the whites. The Indian Bureau has been incompetent, oppressive, and too indifferent to the needs of the Indians. Protests against the unjust and harsh treatment of the Indians have been unheeded, and as the years have gone by the lot of the Indians, speaking in a general way, has become more unbearable.

I visited a number of reservations, Mr. President, and have examined the reports of investigations made, and I have no hesitancy in saying that the treatment accorded the Indians cannot be squared with any rational, humane, or moral conduct.

The civil service as applied to the Indians has built up an inefficient and incompetent bureaucracy, under which the progress of the Indians has been interfered with and the individual, economic, and moral development has been impeded.

I was dissatisfied with the conduct of the Indian administration under the preceding administrations, and believed that a drastic change was required in dealing with the Indians. I supported Mr. Collier in his candidacy for the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs because I believed that he would effectuate reforms and reorganize the Indian Bureau and inaugurate policies that would save the Indians and protect their rights. I believed that he would bring to the consideration of this important question a point of view not possessed by some of his predecessors, and that he would seek in a more humane and rational way to elevate the Indians, to preserve their rights, and to qualify them for citizenship in the United States.

I am not satisfied that this measure reaches all that I had in view. I am not satisfied that it will not perpetuate this bureaucratic system which has been so harmful to the Indians. I am rather afraid that this system will perpetuate for an indefinite period an expensive and oppressive bureaucratic organization which in its operation will lead to enervate rather than elevate the Indians. I know that is not the purpose of Mr. Collier. I know that he is anxious for the welfare of the Indians, for their protection and for their education, so that they may be ready to take a man's part in the various States in which they live, and become respected citizens of the United States, ready to participate in all the activities of progressive and patriotic citizens; but I cannot help but believe, from a cursory examination of the bill, that it will continue too much, and to too large a degree, the bureaucratic system, and will not allow a sufficient flexibility upon the part of the Indians for their development, individually and communally.

At any rate, I believe that any change from the past system should be welcomed. A system that called for the expenditure of more than 50 percent of the millions of dollars appropriated to pay the salaries of a great army of Federal employees cannot be defended.

I shall watch the operations of this bill, if enacted into law, and if at the next session of Congress it shall be disclosed that this bureaucratic organization is continued, that part of the appropriation which we make has been largely absorbed in the payment of salaries and bureau administration, I shall not hesitate to condemn the administration, because I insist that the appropriations which we make shall inure to the advantage of the Indians and not to the payment of an army of Federal employees.

I hope that a new deal shall come to the Indians; that the Indian Bureau will be reformed and rational and sound policies put into operation. The heavy hand of an incompetent and inefficient bureaucracy has cursed our Government, and the Indian has been caught within its powerful sweep.

I am compelled to leave the Chamber to meet an important engagement, and cannot examine the measure before us as I should like. I can only hope that if this bill passes it will be the harbinger of a brighter day to the wards of this great Nation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I believe if this bill passes the Senate and the House it will be an epoch-making event in the history of Indian legislation.

The history of the Indian is one of tragedy and of shame so far as the white man is concerned. I shall not go into the history of that tragedy, but I hope it is coming to an end. The noble character of the original American has not been appreciated by the white race.

I desire to express my personal appreciation and gratitude to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] for the time and effort they have spent in studying Indian affairs and preparing this bill, with the assistance of the liberal-minded, the humanitarian Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Collier. I hope that under the administration of this bill, if and when it shall be passed, we may make some restitution for the injury and injustice we have done to the noble people who were the original Americans.

I trust the bill will pass.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, referring to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], I call his attention to the provision which requires the vote of 51 percent of the adult Indians living on the reservation—not 51 percent of those who vote upon the subject, but 51 percent of the adult Indians living on the reservation.

I believe that is sufficient to guarantee that a great majority of the Indians are going to favor this proposition before they will adopt it; and it seems to me to require one-third of the adult Indians on the reservation to sign the petition would perhaps make it rather hard for them to get a vote upon the articles of incorporation. I believe one-fourth of the total number of adult Indians on the reservation is sufficient.

In the recall petitions or initiative petitions that the various States have, I do not think there is a single State which has a requirement that as many as one-fourth of the citizens shall sign a petition before they can inaugurate a recall or initiate a measure or have a referendum on a piece of legislation. I believe one-fourth is quite large enough; and I think the Indians are very well protected under the provisions of this paragraph.

It seems to me one-fourth would be much more desirable than one-third, under the circumstances.

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, just a word.

My policy and my position are not to defeat something that will be for the benefit of the future of the Indians. My policy, however, and my attitude, are to safeguard every step that may be taken, to the end that nothing shall be eventually accomplished that will destroy their development or their contentment. It was with that in mind that I offered the suggestion and the amendment providing for one-third.

We would not have a body corporate formed in our private affairs of life excepting by a substantial group. It seems to me that we are dealing here with the lowly and the humble, and, if I may use a rather harsh expression, perchance the ignorant, although we have tried to raise them to a position of literacy; but we are dealing, nevertheless, with the ignorant and those dependent upon them. Why should not that percentage be raised to an extent that would be at least representative of a fair cross section of the element with which we are dealing? It seems to me fair, and not an excessive requirement.

My first thought was to require 51 percent, and then I reduced it to one-third. It seems to me that no harm can flow from that, and yet it will accomplish the desired result.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MCCARRAN. I do.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator again to the fact that the purpose of having one-fourth sign the petition is only to bring the matter to a vote.

Mr. MCCARRAN. I know that; but I have seen post traders in Indian reservations who could bring in one-fourth of the Indians of a particular tribe or reservation, because they owed the trader bills running over months and months, and he said, "I am going to cut off your credit unless you sign."

Mr. FRAZIER. That might apply even to 50 percent; but we hope this bill will remedy that situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place, a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. —. That the order of the Department of the Interior signed, dated, and approved by Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, as Secretary of the Interior, on October 28, 1932, temporarily withdrawing lands of the Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona from all forms of mineral entry or claim under the public land mining laws, is hereby revoked and rescinded, and the lands of the said Papago Indian Reservation are hereby restored to exploration and location, under the existing mining laws of the United States, in accordance with the express terms and provisions declared and set forth in the Executive orders establishing said Papago Indian Reservation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Let me say that this has been a matter of controversy with the Indian Bureau for some time. The amendment is one that should not be added to the bill. It is something that is practically foreign to it. It provides that the order of the Department of the Interior signed, dated, and approved by Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, as Secretary of the Interior, on October 28, 1932, temporarily withdrawing lands of the Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona from all forms of mineral entry, shall be revoked and rescinded.

This reservation was set aside for the Papago Indians, who, as I recall, were landless Indians, and the reservation was set aside by the Government. Some mining people went in and located mining claims upon these reservations, and a controversy grew up between the mining companies and the Interior Department; and the former Secretary of the Interior withdrew the lands and said that they should not be open to further mining operations. In my judgment it would very materially injure the reservation for the Indians, but, at any rate, the amendment should not be put on this bill, and I hope it will be rejected.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in my judgment, it is not necessary, at this time, for me to enter into any lengthy discussion of the history of the creation of the Papago Reservation. Hearings were held before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, which were printed and sent to all the Members of the Senate. Suffice to say that the question of the restoration to exploration and entry of the mineral lands within the Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona is an acute question, a question of principle, not particularly because the State of Arizona happens to be involved, but if the same question arose in any other State I would be found in the same attitude.

I take the ground that neither the Commissioner of Indian Affairs nor the Secretary of the Interior has any power to suspend the mining laws of the United States. Only an act of Congress can do that.

The Papago Indians are a worthy tribe of nomadic, wandering Indians who have never been at war with the United States. They inhabit, and have for years inhabited, the southwestern part of Arizona. They are in a small way stockmen. They catch birds and small mammals and live partly by limited agriculture. They take mesquite and other desert growth to towns and settlements.

They had no reservation, but roamed about, and the charitably disposed and humanitarian people of Arizona, although much opposed to the creation of Indian reservations because the withdrawal of public lands meant that that much more land was forever withdrawn from taxation; they nevertheless decided that it would be charitable, at least, to see to it that these Indians should have a reservation; that is to say, have the right to the surface, the usufruct of the land.

Whereupon an agreement was entered into between the Federal Government and the Governor of Arizona and the then Senators and Representative in Congress from Arizona. It was understood that the Indians were to be given a reservation, or, more strictly speaking, the right to have the use of the surface of something over 2,000,000 acres in southwestern Arizona.

It was distinctly understood and made a part of the agreement that the mining laws of the United States should not be suspended, and that the right of American citizens to prospect, to search and explore for minerals, and locate the same should be preserved intact. Whereupon, without now mentioning other orders which came afterward, and some that went before, but in no wise impairing the language, and always repeating the language I am going to read, the reservation was created upon this distinct, expressed, written agreement between the officials of Arizona and the Department of the Interior, as follows:

The foregoing reservation is hereby created with the understanding that—

I am now reading from the order creating the reservation—

The foregoing reservation is hereby created with the understanding that all mineral lands within the reservation which have been or which may be shown to be such and subject to exploration, location, and entry under the existing mining laws of the United States, and the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior applying thereto, shall continue to be subject to such exploration, location, and entry, notwithstanding the creation of this reservation; and town sites, necessary in connection with the development of the mineral resources of the reservation, may be located within the reservation under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and patented under the provisions of the town-site laws of the United States.

Mr. President, it was then absolutely within the power of the Arizona delegation in Congress to prevent the creation of this reservation. Indeed, every newspaper in the State of Arizona criticized the Arizona delegation then in Congress for consenting to the creation of any reservation. We had, indeed, no idea that there would ever come a Secretary of the Interior or a Commissioner of Indian Affairs who would violate the express, written agreement, the express terms upon which the reservation was created.

I ask Senators to take the pamphlet issued by the Indian Bureau, and they will find that in every order made concerning the Papago Indian Reservation this language was repeated. It is quite unusual, but it is clear, and at the risk of tediousness I repeat some of the phrases.

The foregoing—

Meaning the Papago Indian Reservation—is hereby created with the understanding—

With whom? With the people of Arizona and with her officials—that all mineral lands within the reservation—

Should be opened, as they had been from time immemorial, to location by prospectors and miners.

The reservation was created on February 1, 1917, and down through the years between 1917 and 1932 citizens now and then made some locations upon the lands of the so-called "Papago Indian Reservation"; and my able friend the Senator from Montana seemed to fear that large mining companies might acquire most of the claims. That is an erroneous impression the Senator has obtained, and I ask permission at this point to print in the RECORD a list of all the mining claims on the Papago Indian Reservation which have been patented, together with the names of the patentees and the area and when patented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

List of approved mining claims in that portion of the Papago Indian Reservation, Ariz., embraced by Executive Order No. 2524, dated Feb. 1, 1917

[Compiled from the records in U.S. Public Survey Office at Phoenix, Ariz., on Oct. 31, 1932]

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I would be false to my own sentiment and to my own feelings if at this time I failed to say that the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Collier, did not withdraw these lands from mineral entry. The present Commissioner of Indian Affairs did not violate the agreement that was made with the State of Arizona. That agreement was violated by a former Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, by order of October 28, 1932. Therefore, when I inveigh against the action of the Department of the Interior for violating the agreement made with Arizona, I am not criticizing, even by innuendo, the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Indeed, while I do not agree with all of the theories and conclusions of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I do not agree with many of his acts, I am pleased to say that he is a gentleman of high character, of devotion to what he thinks would be best for the Indians. He is a gentleman of culture and wide information. I have no particular quarrel with him. He is frankness personified, and in the hearings held by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, the committee so ably presided over by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], I asked the Commissioner whether he held the opinion that these mineral rights on the Papago belonged to the Indians. He frankly replied: "I do not. I find no evidence whatever tending to show that the mines or the minerals belong to the Indians."

Moreover, the Department of the Interior, through its Solicitor, has rendered its opinion, to wit, on March 7 of this year, holding that these mineral lands do not belong to the Indians, and are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Indian Bureau, but that the minerals, the right to explore for minerals and extract the same and acquire patents, does now and always has reposed in the Federal Government, just as in the case of all other mineral lands on public domain.

Mr. President, in my opinion, if the Solicitor could have, by any stretching of the imagination, by any intentment, reached an opinion holding that the mineral belonged to the Indians, the Solicitor would have done so, and he is secure from my prejudice in his desire to see that these lands pass from out the jurisdiction of the Federal Government itself and into the domain of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, because sitting here in Washington some persons absorb the idea that a prospector is someone who is anxious to exploit the public domain. Mr. President, quite the reverse. The prospector smites the face of nature. He goes out upon the hills and there by patient toil, depriving himself, in many cases, of social contact, he discovers minerals. He complies with the law of the land, and if he be successful the money metals that he extracts are poured into the channels and veins of trade, thereby enriching the country at large.

Indeed, Mr. President, it was none other than the prospector himself who opened the great West, who made it possible for the people of the littoral on the Atlantic side of our continent to become a part of the citizenship of the great West. Indeed, Mr. President, the prospector, so far from being a detriment to our country, as he has been pictured by so many bureaucrats, is preeminently the forerunner of civilization, he is the forerunner of prosperity, and one of the great reasons why the depression has been so poignant and so severe is because we have strangled by bureaucratic rule the activities of the prospector.

Mr. President, it was, I repeat, Secretary Ray Lyman Wilbur who by his mere ipse dixit paralyzed the mining law of the United States, or attempted to do so in the instant case. I have never recognized his order as law; in fact, I have advised some prospectors to disregard the promulgation by Secretary Wilbur and to go ahead and locate mining claims, knowing that the courts would hold that only Congress can suspend the mining laws. But the former Secretary, Mr. Wilbur, zealous to do something, as he thought, for the Indians, misadvised, under a misapprehension, proceeded to sign this order which has brought chaos in southwestern Arizona, which has upset a whole county—indeed, two counties—which has suspended all mining operations on the reservations, and even the Papago Indians themselves are largely opposed to this order of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, whence comes the title to these lands? When the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was ratified it was indeed provided that all valid grants within the domain acquired by the United States from Mexico should be recognized.

Later when the lands under the Gadsden Purchase were acquired—and these lands in question are within the Gadsden Purchase—it was repeated that all valid titles should be deemed and be considered to be valid by the United States. But no lawyer, no court has in the course of 80 years pretended that these Papago Indians had any title to the lands that could be recognized under either treaty. The Department of the Interior has never held that there was any recognition of such rights.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that while we are dealing with the subject of Indians, this would be an appropriate place for this amendment, which would do no more than restore the status quo, do no more than restore the mining rights as they existed from the time of the ratification of the Gadsden Treaty down to the day when Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur in 1932 issued his order withdrawing all the mineral lands within the Papago Indian Reservation from sale and settlement.

If Congress now is prepared to countenance an order issued by the Secretary of the Interior withdrawing lands from settlement, withdrawing mineral lands, then, forsooth, any Secretary of the Interior may at any time withdraw all the mining lands, withdraw all the lands within the Senators' several States, and declare that they shall not be eligible to mining or prospecting.

It is not particularly because this land happens to be within the State which I in part represent that I take the position I do. I inveigh against the principle involved. I say that Congress alone has the right and the power to suspend the mining laws. We may some time have a Secretary of the Interior, if these orders are countenanced, who would do quite the reverse and would say that for the general public it is wise to deprive these Indians of their mining rights when their rights are recognized by Congress. Laws are made by Congress and executed by the bureaus and by the departments of the Government. So, Mr. President, I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, let the amendment be read.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated once more at the request of the Senator from Nevada.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed at the proper place to insert a new section as follows:

SEC. —. That the order of the Department of the Interior signed, dated, and approved by Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, as Secretary of the Interior, on October 28, 1932, temporarily withdrawing lands of the Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona from all forms of mineral entry or claim under the public land mining laws, is hereby revoked and rescinded, and the lands of the said Papago Indian Reservation are hereby restored to exploration and location, under the existing mining laws of the United States, in accordance with the express terms and provisions declared and set forth in the Executive orders establishing said Papago Indian Reservation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am unable at this time to disagree with what the Senator from Arizona has stated with reference to the interpretation which he has placed upon the order of the Secretary of the Interior; but I submit that if what he has said is true, it is necessary for an act of Congress to be passed in order that the people in his State should get the rights which they claim they have. But this goes further than merely setting aside the order of the Secretary of the Interior, because it declares that from now on, regardless of whether or not these Indians at the present time hold these valuable mineral rights, if they are mineral rights, they shall be taken away from them, and that the lands shall be thrust open to development by anyone who wishes to go in there.

I also desire to call attention to the fact that by the proposed amendment not only do we take the mineral rights away from them and leave the lands open to exploration, but in addition to that we make it possible for people to go onto that reservation and to mine without paying the Indians anything for that right.

Mr. President, I submit that this is not the proper place for the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. The matter is in controversy between the Department and one of the mining companies in Arizona, and I have volunteered to go to Arizona with the Senator from Arizona, or to have the Committee on Indian Affairs go there and to hold hearings and investigate the matter further, and then, if the committee and the Department can work out something which is satisfactory and just both to the Indians and to the mining companies there, we are quite willing to do it. But this is not the time and this is not the place to attach this kind of an amendment to the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my sense of fairness and justice compels me to say that no one could have been more considerate than the able Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. No one could have been more patient. Indeed, I feel like apoligizing for the way I abused his patience and the patience of the committee in the hearings on this subject. The Senator from Montana, with due deference to all other Members of this body, is one of the ablest lawyers of the Senate. The Senator from Montana is one of the ablest lawyers who was ever in the State of Montana, which has produced many great lawyers. Surely the Senator, with his keen intellect, must perceive that I am not asking that any additional rights be granted to citizens. I am simply asking that the conditions which existed from the time of the ratification of the Gadsden Purchase Treaty until 1932 be restored—that that status quo be restored. That is all.

Surely the Senator from Montana is not prepared to say that any Commissioner of the General Land Office or any Commissioner of Indian Affairs or any Secretary of the Interior has the power to suspend the mining laws of the United States. The Senator will not say that, for he is an able lawyer.

The Senator has indeed been so courteous and so kind as to offer to proceed to Arizona upon the adjournment of Congress, or soon thereafter, to investigate this subject. But, Mr. President, before any investigation is made, before any person begins to hold pourparlers with me as to a particular subject, he must first return that which he has taken illegally.

Not intending to imply that the able Senator from Montana has taken anything illegally, I mean that the Secretary of the Interior, having set up his own judgment as law, now, by a successor in office, is saying, "Unless you agree that my previous illegal order shall be ratified and confirmed, I decline to have anything further to do with you." Mr. President, with contempt I refuse to enter into any such an agreement. Not with indignation, I repeat, but with contempt, I decline to hold pourparlers or make any arrangement with those who say, "Allow me to keep that which I took unlawfully, and then I will talk with you as to how much more I am going to take."

I ask Senators to restore the status quo. Then we will talk about some other arrangements.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if I may say just a word in reply to the Senator, I offered to go to Arizona at his request——

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. And to investigate this situation. There are questions of law involved in it as well as questions of fact, upon which it has not been possible to agree. With those questions the Committee on Indian Affairs is not sufficiently conversant at this time, nor is the Senate sufficiently conversant with them, to enable them to pass an intelligent judgment upon them. It may be that everything the Senator stated is correct with reference to the agreement; but, if correct, then the Secretary of the Interior acted illegally; and if he did act illegally it is not necessary to pass a law of this kind to set aside his illegal act.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, prospectors, as a rule, are men of limited means. The Senator invites prospectors to go into court to test this question. It is a lengthy, it is a protracted, and it is an expensive procedure for a lone prospector to go into court to contest the order of the Interior Department.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that those involved in this case are not lowly, poor prospectors. As a matter of fact, they have had legal counsel employed to come to Washington, who have been to the Committee on Indian Affairs on several occasions. Some of the men who are interested in this mining claim and this property are men of some means, because they have followed me clear to Montana to talk to me with reference to it. They are not the lowly prospectors the Senator has pictured to the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is my information that a vast majority of these claims are held by individuals. In order to prove that contention which I make I am going again to invite Senators to peruse pages 16, 17, 18, and 19 of the hearings before the committee on April 24, from which it would appear that the vast majority of these claims are held by individuals. Each claim has a different name; each one apparently was patented at a date not quite related to any other date. It is not a fact that the large mining companies of Arizona are interested in acquiring these lands. I hold no brief for the large mining companies in Arizona or any other State. The able Senator from Montana, if he will pardon me, is absolutely mistaken in his conclusion that the so-called "large mining companies" in Arizona or any other State are interested per se, as mining companies, in throwing the lands of the Papago Indian Reservation open to settlement.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I made no such statement as that. I simply said that some of the people who were interested in some of these claims were men of means, and that they employed counsel. I do not contend that the large mining companies of Arizona own these claims, because my understanding is that they do not; but there are some promoters there and some people who are interested in some of these claims who apparently have means.

Mr. ASHURST. That may be so. If the Senator knows of anyone in these days who has means he has discovered a sort of individual I do not frequently meet. Now, therefore, I shall make a disclosure to the Senate in order to be perfectly frank. All the information I possess on this subject comes either from personal examination of the land, or from data sent to me by the Chamber of Commerce of Tucson, Ariz. I know of only one man who has talked with me in Washington on the subject of the Papago Indian Reservation, a Mr. Mitke, who is a mining engineer and an able citizen. He has been here and talked to me probably for 5 minutes, and has written me dozens of letters on the subject. He is the only person, except my own colleague and the Member in the House from the State of Arizona, who has talked with me in Washington about the Papago Indian Reservation except, of course, department officials. So I am sure that, if the Senator has been able to discover any lobby, insidious or otherwise, around Washington, in favor of restoring these lands to mining, the Senator's already great fame as an investigator is enhanced by the discovery he has thus made.

No, Mr. President; the prospectors, the miners of the State of Arizona are anxious not to be subjects of public charity, anxious not to be living on the dole, anxious to secure work, want to go out on the reservation and begin to develop and search for minerals. Not only is it a worthy cause, but it is a romantic one, and I think the Senate owes it to itself, owes it to the State of Arizona, owes it to law and proper procedure, to restore these lands to the status they occupied from the day of the Gadsden Treaty until Secretary Wilbur by his ipse dixit presumed to withdraw these lands from entry.

It is not a sufficient answer when citizens' rights are assailed to say, "Go hire a lawyer; go to a court." No; if his rights have been stricken down, we have the power to correct the situation and we should do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I make some inquiries of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does this bill in any way attempt to deal with the so-called "inherent water rights" of the Indians on reservations?

Mr. WHEELER. No; it does not. It leaves all the water rights just exactly as they have been in the past.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no attempt to confirm any particular policy with regard to the water rights of the Indians?

Mr. WHEELER. None whatever.

Mr. PITTMAN. The reason I make that inquiry is this: As the Senator knows, there has been a legal dispute for a number of years as to just what rights the Indians obtained under treaties with regard to the flowing waters of a Territory prior to its becoming a State. While I desire, of course, that every Indian in my State shall have an equal right with every citizen of the State and an equal benefit under the utilization of the few waters we have, I should not like to vote for a bill which would in any way attempt by legislation to confirm a policy which is now in dispute.

Mr. WHEELER. There is nothing touching water rights in any way, shape, or form in the pending bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I may say, for instance, we have two reservations in the State, which were established by proclamation just prior to the admission of the Territory of Nevada to statehood. One of those reservations lies across the Walker River and the other, the Truckee River; one where it flows into Walker Lake and the other where it flows into Pyramid Lake. The Government has contended for years that, by virtue of the establishment of those reservations and the inducing of the Indians to go upon the particular reservations, there was implied an agreement to supply them with sufficient water to irrigate the entire area within the reservations, without regard to whether or not it was susceptible of irrigation. That holding made it necessary eventually for the Government to build a dam on the Walker River and to impound water to meet that demand of the Indian Bureau. So that the water, under the ruling, might not be taken away from the settlers who had appropriated the use of the water for 50 or 60 years.

Mr. WHEELER. I am familiar with that situation.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is familiar with it?

Mr. WHEELER. I am very familiar with it.

Mr. PITTMAN. And this bill in no way affects that situation?

Mr. WHEELER. It does not affect it in the slightest degree.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I ask permission to read from page 5 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs held on April 24, 1934. Mr. Collier, the able Commissioner, was giving his statement or testimony. I quote from page 5:

Mr. COLLIER. I have previously stated my view pertaining to this particular contract, that I do not myself see any evidence to support the contention that the tribe owned or had ever owned the minerals.

Who is this speaking? Not the able Senator from Montana, not your humble servant; it is the Commissioner of Indian Affairs speaking, on page 5 of the hearings held April 24 last. I repeat:

Mr. COLLIER. I have previously stated my view pertaining to this particular contract, that I do not myself see any evidence to support the contention that the tribe owned or had ever owned the minerals.

Senator ASHURST. I commend your frankness, Mr. Commissioner. In other words, you do not contend that the tribe owns the minerals?

Commissioner COLLIER. That has seemed to me at all times clear.

There is intellect. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is able quickly to perceive facts and state them accurately and truthfully. He continued:

That has to me at all times seemed clear. Of course, that is a layman's view, and, furthermore, here is the opinion of the solicitor who holds that view.

That is, the attorney for the Department of the Interior.

Senator STEIWER. Do you say that is the Solicitor's view also?

Commissioner COLLIER. Yes, sir.

Senator STEIWER. And it is the Department's view now?

Commissioner COLLIER. Yes.

Senator STEIWER. I think it is more than a mere layman's view, then. It is the Government's attitude deliberately arrived at.

Commissioner COLLIER. Well, I had expressed this view before the Solicitor rendered his opinion.

Mr. President, I repeat that if the present Secretary of the Interior, if the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the present Solicitor of the Department, could by any stretching of the law, could by any intendment, have reached a conclusion that those minerals belonged to the Indians, those officials would have done so, because they are zealous for power, they are anxious for jurisdiction, but their intellectual honesty prevented their reaching such a conclusion.

I am asking the Senate to live up to the agreement made with Arizona and the statement of the Department of the Interior that the minerals do not belong to the Indians.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Am I to understand the effect of the order made by Secretary Wilbur is to prevent prospecting on that portion of the lands?

Mr. ASHURST. Absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. How long has that condition prevailed?

Mr. ASHURST. The order is presumed to have taken effect October 28, 1932. Mark you, from 1852 until that time prospecting, searching for minerals, the location of minerals, took place, and 120 mining claims were located in good faith and patented.

Mr. BORAH. What is the objection to the Senator's amendment, except it is claimed it does not belong in the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. That is the only objection. The objection of my able friend from Montana is that it might destroy the symmetry of his bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no!

Mr. ASHURST. The able Senator feels it is a contested question that ought to have more thorough investigation.

Mr. WHEELER. Not only that, but let me say to the Senator from Idaho there has been a conflict, and there is some question in my mind, from a thorough investigation of the matter, as to whether title was conveyed and whether or not the Indians took title. Also I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona this question: Suppose a mining company or individuals go in there to engage in mining, are they willing to pay the Indians a rental for the surface rights?

Mr. ASHURST. I cannot speak for them. So far as I am concerned, I would reject such a proposal. I decline to live by any man's leave underneath the law.

Mr. WHEELER. The situation would simply be that if these lands were all thrown open to mining claims, as the Senator from Idaho knows, what they would do would be to go in and stake out the mining claims and virtually take the reservation away from the Indians.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh no, Mr. President.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes!

Mr. ASHURST. Why did they not do it from 1852 up to 1932? They have taken only 120 claims out of a total of 2,300,000 acres.

Mr. WHEELER. There are many tracts of land. They could go in and cut a reservation all to pieces by taking up mining claims. As I understand, the Bureau of Mines has even suggested that if they did that, they should lease from the Indians the surface rights which belong to them; but these people are unwilling to lease or to pay anything for the surface rights for the use of the title to the Indian lands. There is no question at all that under the law the surface rights to the Indian lands belong to the Indians. These people want to take the surface rights an pay nothing for them.

Mr. BORAH. Would it not be within the power of the Indian Commissioner or the Bureau of Indian Affairs to require that they take a lease?

Mr. WHEELER. As I understand, the Indian Bureau is trying to work out a bill for the purpose of settling the dispute in a proper way and providing that they shall have the power to lease the land for this purpose under certain conditions.

As I said a while ago, when the Senator came to me and asked me if I would go to Arizona, I said I would. I do not think at the present time they can lease the lands in the fashion the Senator has suggested. I do not think they have the authority to do it.

Mr. ASHURST. As to the able Senator from Montana—and I am not using mere words of flattery when I say "able Senator from Montana"; we were college mates in the university in other days—not happier days, but other days—as I said, my friendship and admiration for the Senator from Montana go back long before we came to the Senate. In my judgment, he has never postulated an argument upon more uncertain grounds that the argument he makes today. These lands were subject to exploration and mineral entry from 1852 until 1932. There were during that time 120 claims filed upon and patented. It is not true that the people of Arizona are gathered around like a lot of cormorants to rush in and "take" the lands from the Indians.

The fact is that the Arizona delegation in Congress could have prevented the creation of this reservation in 1917, but we consented that the Indians should have surface rights with an understanding, and the understanding was written into the proclamation creating the reservation in 1917. I ask the able Senator from Montana to listen to this and say if he is prepared to repudiate an agreement between the United States and the State of Arizona. This is how the reservation was created. This is the agreement made before we consented to the creation of the reservation. The proclamation was signed by Woodrow Wilson, to which all parties agreed, as follows:

The foregoing reservation is hereby created with the understanding that all mineral lands within the reservation which have been or which may be shown to be such and subject to exploration, location, and entry under the existing mining laws of the United States and the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior applying thereto, shall continue to be subject to such exploration, location, and entry notwithstanding the creation of this reservation; and town sites, necessary in connection with the development of the mineral resources of the reservation, may be located within the reservation under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and patented under the provisions of the town-site laws of the United States.

President Wilson and his Secretary of the Interior respected that proclamation. President Harding and his Secretary of the Interior, as well as President Coolidge and his Secretary of the Interior, respected that provision, and there was no swarming of land grabbers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Has anyone ever sought to contest by court action the legality of that order?

Mr. ASHURST. Not so far as I know; but a number of citizens have written me and I have replied to them to go ahead and make their locations, set up their monuments if they made a valid discovery of minerals, and allow themselves to be arrested. Of course, the court would instantly hold that such a citizen was not a trespasser in going upon the public lands and searching for minerals and locating them if he discovered them. That is my judgment as a lawyer. I do not feel that it is immodest, on this point at least, for me to put myself in opposition to the opinion of my able friend the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, I am ready for a vote.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am not only concerned about the amendment of the Senator from Arizona but I am concerned about the implications of this bill, which go to the very kind of thing the Senator is talking about.

Section 3 of the bill proposes that in the case of every Indian reservation in this country that has been opened to settlement, where any land is left that has not been taken up, the land shall be put back into a reservation. I am not familiar with the conditions in other States, and I cannot speak as to what the effect will be in those States; but I know that in my own State, where some years ago we opened to settlement an Indian reservation of more than a million acres of land, only a comparatively small amount of which has been settled, there are homes of white men on homesteads which they took, scattered all through that reservation; but it is an open country. It is not a closed reservation, as it was prior to the time when they could settle there. This bill now proposes to give the President the power to put all the surrounding land back into the Indian reservations; in fact, it directs the Secretary of the Interior to do so. We are breeding more trouble by this proposed legislation than we have ever dreamed of, if that is to be the effect of it.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. No; I will not interrupt the Senator. I thought he was through.

Mr. DILL. I am not through, and if I had known this measure was to come up, I would not be through for a long time.

For years and years Members of Congress from Western States have made a long fight here to open Indian reservations to settlement and to make it possible to use these lands that the Indian never did use, and has not the ability to use, and will not for generations to come. These lands that have been opened and are not used are now by this bill to be thrown back into a closed reservation, and we shall find ourselves in another session of Congress or two confronted with the demands of the people to open the reservations which we fought for many years to have opened. It is the most backward step, so far as the opening of the western country is concerned, that I have seen in the Congress in the 20 years I have had the honor to be about the Capitol.

I do not believe Representatives and Senators have any conception of what it is going to mean if we put back into a closed reservation every area that has been opened to settlement that is not now taken up by white ownership.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand that it is conceded that the effect of this bill will be to put these lands back into reservations?

Mr. DILL. If the Senator will read section 3, I think he will agree that there cannot be any misunderstanding of what it means:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to restore to tribal ownership the remaining surplus lands of any Indian reservation heretofore opened or authorized to be opened, to sale, or any other form of disposal by Presidential proclamation, or by any of the public-land laws of the United States.

Mr. FRAZIER. There is a proviso at the end of section 3.

Mr. DILL. Oh, that the valid rights or claims of persons to lands withdrawn shall not be interfered with, of course; but these white men who have taken up their homes, homesteaded them, and own them, will find themselves set down in a closed Indian reservation.

Mr. WHEELER. That is not correct. That is not the effect of the bill.

Mr. DILL. What is the effect of it?

Mr. WHEELER. There is no closed Indian reservation in the sense that that term was formerly used.

Mr. DILL. I think I have lived among Indian reservations about as long as anybody.

Mr. WHEELER. A closed reservation means that white people cannot go on the reservation. If there is any question at all about that in the mind of the Senator, if he will investigate the law upon the subject, he will find that that is true.

Mr. DILL. What is the meaning of this section?

Mr. WHEELER. The meaning of it is simply this:

On a few of the reservations in the country at the present time there are some lands belonging to the Indian tribes that have been offered for sale. They have not been sold. Some of them belong, for instance, to deceased Indians. They are still being held and have not been sold. What this bill seeks to do is to take those lands that have not been sold and to put them back where they can be used by the Indians themselves, instead of having them sold by the Government or held without getting practically any revenue at all from them. Those who framed and administered the General Allotment Act apparently assumed that after the passage of the act no more children would be born to Indians. Nearly all tribal land not needed for distribution was declared surplus land and this so-called "surplus land" was thrown open to entry by white purchasers.

Mr. DILL. I am not talking about that kind of land. The bill says "surplus land." These lands that have been opened to settlement are no longer the lands of the Indians.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes, they are.

Mr. DILL. Except that they are for sale to the public.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; they are surplus lands. They belong to the Indian. The Senator again does not understand the situation.

Mr. DILL. But not for his use.

Mr. WHEELER. But what has happened is that the Government has been in a position where it could sell these lands. Now the Government seeks to stop that, because of the fact that these poor, unfortunate Indians are being found landless. The Government has taken the lands and sold them to white people, and then the Indians have been absolutely at the mercy of the white people, have been poverty stricken.

The Senator talks about white people coming down here and wanting to open these reservations. As far as I am concerned, let me say to the Senator that I do not care if every white man in my State wants to rob the Indians; I am not going to stand on the floor of the Senate and be a party to it.

Mr. DILL. Oh, well, nothing about robbing the Indians is involved here.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes, it is. What we are seeking to do by this bill is to protect the Indians.

Mr. DILL. These reservations have been opened after long fights in both Houses, by proclamation of the President; and now it is proposed to take back this land and put it under Indian control, instead of allowing it to be sold and disposed of and developed. The Indian never did develop it. He never will. The only thing he will ever get out of it will be what money he will sell it for.

Mr. WHEELER. That is not a correct statement of the facts. In many instances today, as the Senator would know if he were familiar with it, where Indians have had an opportunity at all, and where they have been given any help at all, they are working their lands; and even in the Senator's own State, where I visited the reservations, Indians will be found there who are working lands, and prospering and getting along. That is true not only in his State but in every other State.

Mr. DILL. But that is not the land which the Senator proposes to put back under Indian control.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes, it is!

Mr. DILL. I know about that land in my own State, because when I was in the House of Representatives I brought about the opening of about a million acres of land. The Indian never has and never will settle those lands, and yet we are going to put them back in Indian reservations again.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that if he will go out and visit the open reservations in his own State he will find that many of the Indians are working lands.

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. The white people have not taken those lands. They have not wanted them. They have used them, but they have not bought them.

Mr. DILL. The Indian has been given the choice land in his allotments, and he is working some of it and renting some of it. That is what I am talking about; and great bodies of land which might be taken up and used by white men are just withdrawn now by one fell swoop of a statute that wipes them all out.

Mr. WHEELER. The Secretary now can prevent the sale of these lands if he wants to at any time.

Mr. DILL. Oh, no; he cannot, unless he gets the President to make a proclamation reversing what has already been done by him.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is wrong again about that.

Mr. DILL. I am not wrong.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is wrong as a matter of law.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I merely desire to call attention to the fact that section 3, which is the subject of discussion at this moment, relates only to surplus lands.

Mr. WHEELER. Exactly.

Mr. STEIWER. It does not relate to allotted lands, and in my own opinion it would not relate to unallotted tribal lands. It relates only to those tribal lands not necessary for allotment or for other purposes, but are regarded as surplus lands and usually are embraced in the area which is excluded from the reserved area where the size of a reservation is diminished by Executive order.

Mr. DILL. Yes; and it is proposed now to put the land back into the reservation.

Mr. STEIWER. These surplus lands are offered for sale, the proceeds of sale to be employed for the benefit of the Indians. The question is whether the Indian is to have such proceeds or the use of land which he does not need.

These surplus lands, generally speaking, are not considerable in amount. I think there is no great area of surplus lands that would be affected by section 3 of the bill. Such areas as there are under this language would no longer be offered for sale but they would be held by the United States Government for the use of the Indians, either to be allotted at a subsequent time or to be treated as tribal lands, to be used in common, or for some other purpose, for the benefit of the Indians. So, although there is force in the contention of the Senator from Washington, I think it is not of the major importance which he has ascribed to it.

Mr. DILL. The Senator now advances the practical proposition that these lands that have not been sufficiently valuable in an agricultural way or for any other purpose for the white men to homestead and take up may be allotted to the Indian. What good will they be to the Indian? He has not made use of the good land that was given to him; but we are going to put this land back into the Indian reservations.

Mr. STEIWER. I hope the Senator from Washington is not disturbed by the suggestion he is now making. On three reservations in Oregon— and I think on the Yakima Reservation in Washington—the tillable land was allotted to the Indians. In addition to the tillable land, those reservations contained land that lay up against or upon the mountains, in some cases upon very high mountains. That mountainous land was not allotted in the first instance. As the years have gone by, the Indians found in some areas that they have a real necessity for making use of that land for the purpose of providing pasturage for their livestock; so, in more recent years on certain reservations in my State, and I think upon reservations in the State of Washington, the Interior Department has allotted portions of these surplus lands. They are additional allotments, or supplemental allotments in many cases. That has not worked hardship upon the Indians; on the contrary, the allotment of these lands is beneficial to the Indians; and I am convinced these surplus lands ought still to be reserved from sale, that they may in the future be subject to further allotment in those cases in which they are valuable to the Indians.

Mr. DILL. I have not any objection to the allotment of lands that were reserved when these reservations were thrown open. What I am objecting to is the backward step that proposes to reverse and wipe off the statute books every law that has been passed opening Indian reservations in Western States, so far as the lands not now taken up and sold to white men are concerned. That is what I am objecting to. This bill does that, and nobody can change that language, and nobody can change the results of that language, because the Secretary of the Interior is directed to put all these lands back into Indian reservations.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRAZIER. I desire to ask the Senator how long ago this land in his State was thrown open.

Mr. DILL. It does not make any difference when it was thrown open.

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; it does.

Mr. DILL. The land of which I am particularly thinking, more than a million acres, was opened in 1915 or 1916, and I should say that probably 100,000 or 150,000 acres of it have been opened to settlement. Some of it has been bought, and the properties that have been bought in that particular reservation are like the squares in a checkerboard; they are scattered here and there among the Indian lands.

Now, instead of leaving those other lands open for sale, I may say that a development that is going on will make much of that land valuable that heretofore has not been valuable, because of cheap electricity—those lands are all to be thrown back into the Indian reservation, under direct Indian control. It is that to which I object. It will cause trouble all over the western country, and we shall be back here in the next session of Congress to repeal this law and direct the President to issue a new proclamation.

Mr. FRAZIER. I cannot agree with the Senator from Washington on that point.

Mr. DILL. What does the Senator think is the effect of section 3?

Mr. FRAZIER. I think the land that has not been bought these 8 or 10 or 12 or 15 or 20 years, because no one wanted it, and which is now Indian land, should go back to the Indian who needs it.

Mr. DILL. What will be done with it?

Mr. FRAZIER. It will be used for grazing purposes and similar purposes.

Mr. DILL. Then there will be Indians trying to graze stock in and around all these tracts where white men are now living.

Mr. FRAZIER. That can be arranged by fencing.

Mr. DILL. Who is to pay for fences in that country?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question, both of the Senator from Washington and of the Senator from Montana in charge of the bill. What would be the effect of the language contained in section 3 upon the settlers and entrymen on Indian lands under the public land laws of the United States?

Mr. DILL. There could not be any more settlement. It would be lost.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is wrong as to that. This would not affect the public-land laws of the States in the slightest degree.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I mean of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. It would not affect the public-land laws of the United States in the slightest degree.

Here is why the bill is necessary: When the lands were allotted on some of the Indian reservations it was said that all the remainder of the lands which had not been allotted would be sold and the proceeds would be turned over to the Indians. Now it is found that many of these Indians have had children, and they are seeking allotments for those Indian children. What is to become of the Indian children if they cannot get allotments? They will become paupers, they will be turned, eventually, upon the State of Washington, upon the State of Oregon, and upon the other States. The bill simply seeks to take the surplus lands which have not been sold, which no white man has wanted to buy, and turn them back, so that they will be allotted to the Indians for the purpose of grazing their stock; or in the event that they are good for farming, the lands may be tilled by the Indians.

Is there anything fairer in this world than saying to these Indians, "This land belongs to you; it is your land; and all we are going to do is to save the land that belongs to you for the benefit of your children who have not been allotted any land"?

Is there anybody in the Senate who wants to take that land away from these Indians, and sell it to some white man who may never use it, and turn the Indian children out to be paupers? I cannot conceive of anyone wanting to do that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, what the Senator says goes to the merits of the proposal.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am trying to develop the facts. My question is, Does the section put an end to settlement and sale of lands which have heretofore been opened by proclamation of the President to operation of the public-land laws?

Mr. WHEELER. That is exactly what it seeks to do, to stop the sale of Indian land which has been opened heretofore, and there is only a small amount of it in a few States. The bill seeks to stop that so that the lands can be allotted to the Indian children.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Has the Senator any report from the Department showing the amount involved?

Mr. WHEELER. I have not a report showing the amount involved. I know, however, that it does not amount to much, and affects only a few reservations.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As I understand the argument of the Senator from Washington, it is that heretofore Congress, and the President by proclamation, opened to settlement and entry by white men certain Indian lands.

Mr. WHEELER. Surplus lands.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certain surplus lands.

Mr. DILL. And they became available to settlement under the public-land laws.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes. In many instances white settlers have gone upon those lands.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In the belief that the remainder of the lands would in time also be settled by whites. They were expecting to see the development of white communities in those particular areas. Now, I ask the Senator, Will the effect of the pending bill be to cut off that expectation, so to speak?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know with what expectation they went on the lands.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It was with the expectation that the neighbor would be a white person, and not an Indian.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think they had any right to expect that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Why not?

Mr. WHEELER. Because in every instance, upon every one of these reservations where land has been thrown open, and people have gone in, there were an Indian's house here and a white man's house there. Take the Flathead Reservation, with which I am very familiar, or the Fort Peck Reservation, or the Crow Reservation; every single one of these reservations has been thrown open to settlement, and every one of them contains a small amount of surplus land, and in every instance white people have gone upon those lands. Some of them have settled upon the land and have built homes there. In most instances, however, the white men have not been able to go out and make a living on the land, and most of them have moved away. As a matter of fact, many of them would be delighted to sell the land back to the Indians if they could get what they put into it.

The Indians have to be protected. They have to have lands, or they will be paupers, and this bill seeks to protect the Indians.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me ask, what lands will come within the definition of surplus land?

Mr. WHEELER. Simply the lands which have not been sold, which were offered for sale and have not been sold to anybody.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have in mind a reclamation project upon an Indian reservation which is partially settled. That project is now open to entry to whites. Will it continue to be open to entry, or will it, under this bill, be closed?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think that would come within the definition of surplus lands, because, as I recall, that project comes entirely under a separate law passed with reference to that subject, unless it is an Indian irrigation project.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Would the Senator accept an amendment to the bill to the effect that the provisions of section 3 shall not apply to any lands within the boundaries of any reclamation project heretofore defined?

Mr. WHEELER. It would depend on what it was. If it was purely an Indian project, I should not want to accept the amendment. If it was a white-Indian irrigation project, that would be an entirely different thing.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. What does the Senator mean by a "white-Indian irrigation project"?

Mr. WHEELER. There are some irrigation districts, as I recall, although I am not sure of it, which are purely Indian irrigation districts.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the Senator will agree with me that where Congress has authorized the opening of lands within an Indian reservation to reclamation and development, and has expended money for the construction of a reclamation project, nothing in this measure should be so construed as to interrupt that work.

Mr. WHEELER. Exactly. I am perfectly willing to accept an amendment, if the Senator will draft one, applying to irrigation districts.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall present an amendment later.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if I may again presume to solicit the attention of my able friend the Senator from Montana, let me say that in his argument against my amendment he addressed a part of his remarks to the point that if the amendment were adopted it might tend to do more than restore the status which the lands occupied before the order of the Secretary of the Interior in 1932.

I have so much respect for the opinions of my able friend, particularly his opinions on legal subjects, that, after carefully studying and exploring my amendment, I have determined to modify the amendment to this extent, as follows: On line 7 in the amendment, after the word "rescinded", to strike out the remainder of the amendment, so that it would read:

That the order of the Department of the Interior signed, dated, and approved by Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, as Secretary of the Interior, on October 28, 1932, temporarily withdrawing lands of the Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona from all forms of mineral entry or claim under the public-land mining laws is hereby revoked and rescinded.

I am exercising my right to modify my amendment.

The argument which the able Senator makes is that the language of the remainder of the amendment might tend to disturb the status existing before that date. I do not think it would change the status, but, yielding to the able Senator's argument, I wish to remove all doubt, and I wish to be free from the suggestion or the imputation that I am trying to do more than return to the former status. I therefore exercise my right to modify my amendment as indicated.

Mr. WHEELER. I will accept the amendment as modified and take it to conference.

Mr. ASHURST. I am profoundly gratified with the announcement of the Senator, and before I conclude my argument I want to say: I know the Senator is diligent; I know he is opposed to the amendment. I know, however, that he has been fair, and whenever a man, whether in the Senate or out of the Senate, makes me a proposition so fair and so manly as that, my sword arm is paralyzed and my voice is silent, and while I think I have a right, under our precedents and our rules, to be on the conference to which this amendment is to be committed, I shall not ask that I be allowed to exercise that right, because I am biased in favor of my own position, and I shall ask the Senator from Montana to excuse me from serving on the conference. I do so without any reluctance, because I have so much confidence in his intellectual integrity that I believe he will manfully try to sustain an amendment adopted by the Senate, even though he might not agree with the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to recur to section 3. After the explanation made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], I am now more convinced than ever that I am right in my position; and I wish the Senator from Montana would give his attention, for I desire to propose an amendment.

The effect of enacting this bill will be that those parts of the reservations which have been open to entry under the public-land laws and have not yet been taken will be restored to tribal ownership. I take it there are instances in the country where that might be a wise thing to do. I know that in my own State in certain reservations it will cause endless trouble. I believe that, instead of being a direction, the provision should be an authorization that it be done only if the Secretary finds, after an investigation, that it is in the public interest to do it.

Permit me to call the attention of the Senator to what happened in regard to the Colville Indian Reservation in my State. For many years we fought to get a law to open to settlement the southern half of that reservation. In 1909 we passed such a law. It was not until some 8 or 9 years later that we could induce the President, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to open the reservation to settlement. He did open it to settlement. A large part of it has been taken up by white settlers; but in opening the reservation, in spite of the law, four townships were reserved to be kept for Indian children who might be born in the future. Four of the best townships of the reservation were kept for the purpose of having lands which could be allotted to these children in the years to come. Those lands have not been absorbed; and it does not seem to me there is any necessity of bringing about the trouble that will be brought about in that area, at least at this time, when we have several townships of land still open to allotment.

There may be some cases where they will want to take the land. I do not know whether or not the land is worth anything.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, what amendment has the Senator in mind?

Mr. DILL. I should like to amend section 3 by striking out the words "and directed", in line 2, and in line 6, after "United States", by adding "in those States where he shall find it to be in the public interest", so that it would be within the Secretary's power to do so, but he would not be compelled to do so. If the bill should be passed as it now reads, he will be compelled to do it. He will have no discretion. If we strike out the words "and directed", in line 2, and after the words "United States" insert "in those States where he shall find it to be in the public interest", he will have the power, but he will not be compelled to do it.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think it should be "in those States." Let us pass over the matter and work out the amendment.

Mr. DILL. The Senator from Montana sees what I want. I do not want the law to be compulsory, so that in cases where it ought not to be done the Secretary will say, "I have no discretion."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, is there an amendment now pending and undisposed of?

Mr. WHEELER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add an additional section at the end of the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. The rights to the use of public waters on lands allotted or acquired or allocated or held for Indian purposes under the provisions of this act, or lands affected hereby, shall in all instances be governed by the statutes and decisions of the respective States applicable thereto as regards duty, appropriation, and beneficial use of said public waters, and where the same have been determined by the constituted authority such determination is hereby recognized, subject to all the rules and laws of the respective States applicable thereto, and subject to all rights of review or appeal as now existent, and no rights or litigants or claimants shall be affected hereby.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, permit me to say to the Senator from Nevada that there is not a thing in this bill at the present time which affects the situation as he has outlined it in his amendment, and there cannot possibly be anything in the bill that affects it. It does not deal in any way, shape, or form with water rights or the acquiring of additional water rights, excepting by purchase by the Secretary of the Interior. I cannot conceive of any reason why an amendment of that kind should be added to the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this amendment is offered pursuant to a long and historic review where the rights to the use of water flowing in public streams and public natural waterways have been matters of controversy.

If the statement of the learned Senator from Montana is correct—and I am entirely agreeable to accept it as being correct—then certainly no harm can flow from the adoption of this amendment. The fact is, however, that this very matter is controversial and has been for years past in all the Western States which have the rule of prior appropriation of water as distinguished from the rule of riparian rights. In other words, where prior appropriation prevails, as distinguished from the riparian doctrine, the appropriation of water attaches to the land; and when the land is set aside or segregated, water is presumed, in accordance with some theories—I am not advocating this—but in accordance with some theories, water from public natural streams is presumed to be allocated by reason of the necessity growing out of climatic conditions.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I think the Senator will agree with me that the Indians have been robbed of water rights a great deal more than the Indian reservations have ever robbed the white men of their water rights. I think that statement applies in his own State, too.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will not go that far. I know that the learned Senator was a member of a committee which went to that part of the country and held hearings, which I attended, which was the first time I had the opportunity of meeting the learned Senator from North Dakota. I do not go so far as the Senator goes, however. I say that the lands allocated to the Indians should have their proper water rights, but they should have them in conformity with rules, customs, and laws prevalent, by which the white man is governed and willing to be governed, and no more.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator's amendment, it seems to me, goes much further than it should go. While it is not necessary, in my judgment, at all, still if the Senator desired to insert something of the kind in the bill he could simply say:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal the laws relating to the use of public waters on lands allotted or acquired or allocated or held for Indian purposes under the provisions of this act.

That would cover what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask to have the Official Reporter read the language suggested by the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Official Reporter will read the language.

The Official Reporter read as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal the laws relating to the use of public waters on lands allotted or acquired or allocated or held for Indian purposes under the provisions of this act.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I will adopt that language. I modify my amendment by the insertion of the language just read and suggested by the learned Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as modified, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add an additional section at the end of the bill, as follows:

> SEC. 20. Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal the laws relating to the use of public waters on lands allotted or acquired or allocated or held for Indian purposes under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk to be added at the end of section 3, which I ask to have stated. This is in pursuance of the discussion in which we engaged just a few moments ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 3 the following proviso:

> Provided further, That this section shall not apply to lands within any reclamation project heretofore authorized in any Indian reservation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I think this is a perfectly proper amendment, and I think it should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to page 3, lines 8 to 21, as follows:

> There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the acquisition of such interests in lands, water rights, and surface rights, and for expenses incident to such acquisition, a sum not to exceed $2,000,000 in any one fiscal year: Provided, That no part of such funds shall be used to acquire additional land for the Navajo Indians in Arizona and New Mexico, in the event that the proposed Navajo boundary-extension measures now pending in Congress and embodied in the bills (S. 2499 and H.R. 8927) to define the exterior boundaries of the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona, and for other purposes, and the bills (S. 2531 and H.R. 8982) to define the exterior boundaries of the Navajo Indian Reservation in New Mexico, and for other purposes, become law.

One of the bills, House bill 8927, has passed both Houses of Congress and will undoubtedly be approved by the President. In that bill, and I am quite sure in respect to the other measure, which relates to the State of New Mexico, there are authorized appropriations of sums of money to acquire land within the proposed boundaries, which is entirely proper; but this language, it seems to me, would repeal that authorization, being a subsequent law. I do not know exactly how to get at it, but I suggest that the bill be amended by inserting after the word "land" in line 13, the words "outside of the Navajo Indian Reservation."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will my colleague kindly restate his amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. I move to insert after the word "land", in line 13, on page 3, the words "outside of the exterior boundaries of the Navajo Reservation."

Mr. WHEELER. I see no objection to the amendment. This particular section was put in by the Department so as to protect the Department in the event that the other bills did not happen to get through Congress.

Mr. HAYDEN. I offer the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 13, after the word "land", it is proposed to insert the words "outside of the exterior boundaries of the Navajo Reservation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to an amendment which I desire to offer on page 2, line 2, to strike out the words "and directed" and after the word "Interior", in line 1, to insert "if he shall find it to be in the public interest", so that the section will read:

> The Secretary of the Interior, if he shall find it to be in the public interest, is hereby authorized to restore to tribal ownership—

And so forth.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I think if the Secretary finds it is "in the public interest" he should be authorized and directed.

Mr. DILL. I think that direction ought to be left out. I think if he is authorized that is sufficient.

Mr. WHEELER. I repeat, I think if he finds it "in the public interest", that he should be authorized and directed to take the action.

Mr. ASHURST. I should provide "that he shall have the power to do so."

Mr. WHEELER. "Or that he shall have the power."

Mr. ASHURST. Instead of directing, why not provide that he shall have the power?

Mr. DILL. I propose to leave out the words "and directed"; I do not think it ought to be made compulsory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 2, after the word "authorized", it is proposed to strike out the words "and directed" and, in line 1, to insert, after the word "Interior", the words "if he shall find it to be in the public interest."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, is there any amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. FESS. There is an absent Senator who desires to offer an amendment, and therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and called the names of Mr. ASHURST and Mr. AUSTIN.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if no Senator has answered to his name, I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No Senator has responded to his name, and the suggestion of the absence of a quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, in line 14, after the word "Seminole" and the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

And provided further, That the provisions of section 4 of this act shall not apply to the Indians of the Klamath Reservation in Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I hope we may avoid the necessity of extended debate on this amendment. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that this is the amendment of which I spoke to him some days ago, concerning which we made an agreement. The only purpose of the amendment is to provide that one section of the bill, and one section only, shall not be applicable to one tribe of Indians in the State of Oregon. This is in accordance with the desires of the Indians, and I hope that there may be no resistance offered to the effort as made by the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I cannot agree with that amendment, let me say, because it seems to me if the majority of the Indians do not want to go into it they have a perfect right to stay out, and this particular section 4 provides that they must have, as I recall——

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, if I may correct him, the Senator has the wrong section.

Mr. WHEELER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I see that that is so.

Mr. STEIWER. This is the section dealing with the disposition of restricted lands, trust lands, and this is the amendment of which I spoke to the Senator from Montana some days ago at the time the calendar was called. It has no relation at all to the incorporation of the properties of the Indians or the right of the Indians by majority vote to remain out of the corporation. I am not seeking to disturb that proposal at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before voting on the passage of the bill, I wish to suggest that I presume, in the interest of symmetry, my amendment should go at the end of the bill. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill as to that.

Mr. WHEELER. It should go at the end of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I am content with that. Let it be added as a new section at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been placed at the end of the bill as section 19. The question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF PUBLIC GRAZING LANDS

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6462, known as the "grazing bill."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6462) to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, in a brief word I wish to offer an explanation of this bill. The bill is commonly known as the "Taylor bill" or the "grazing bill." The public domain, formerly vast, covering all the western part of the United States has by various processes, by withdrawal of the forest reserves for national parks and through homestead entries, gradually been reduced. There is now an area of 173,000,000 acres of land, which is the residue after all the forest withdrawals, after all the national park withdrawals, after all the homestead entries. In fact, very little of it is suitable for homesteads. The homesteader occupied the public domain under the 160-acre homestead law, then under the enlarged 320-acre homestead law, and then under the 640-acre homestead law, until there remains this vast tract suitable almost exclusively for grazing purposes at best.

This land is wholly unregulated. The domain is now open, without limitation or restriction and without cost, to any use that the public may see fit to make of it. Its principal use is that of grazing. Unfortunately the results have been that much of the land, especially that which is the preferable grazing land, has been overgrazed, and it is in a sadly eroded and damaged condition. This bill provides for the creation of grazing districts for the purpose of protecting this residue of the public domain against further damage by water erosion and wind erosion and by limiting the number of stock that may be grazed within the grazing capacity of the land.

The bill does not authorize the creation of grazing districts comprising the entire 173,000,000 acres, but has been limited to 80,000,000 acres. There was some question as to whether or not all this land should be included; consequently the committee has modified the House bill by restricting the authority of the Secretary of the Interior so that he may create grazing districts out of but 80,000,000 acres.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator why the limitation was made? In other words, out of the entire 173,000,000 acres, I understand the bill operates only on 80,000,000?

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Secretary of the Interior to determine for himself in what particular portion of the 173,000,000 acres he will select the 80,000,000 acres?

Mr. ADAMS. That is true. It was the idea to have compact grazing areas, and, perhaps, leaving out the fragmentary areas which were not suitable for compact grazing districts.

Mr. BORAH. Then it gives the Secretary of the Interior complete power to determine for himself on what portion of the 173,000,000 acres he will operate?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; the original bill gave him the power to act with respect to the entire 173,000,000 acres, but the bill now pending really restricts his power rather than enlarges it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; if he is to have the authority to deal with a portion of the land, why is it not wise to give him authority over the entire acreage?

Mr. ADAMS. I will be quite frank in saying to the Senator that my own judgment is that it would be preferable to have the entire area of public lands subject to that jurisdiction, but the committee seemed to feel it was preferable to provide a limitation. That action was agreeable to the Secretary of the Interior, who stated, through his representatives, that their survey indicated that only approximately 50,000,000 acres were so located as to be available for the creation of such grazing districts.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I may say to the Senator from Idaho, in answer to his question that the amendment limiting the operation of the bill to 80,000,000 acres was the result of a belief upon the part of a great many of us in the public-land States that it would be unwise to clothe the Secretary of the Interior with the power to shut off all homesteading in the public-land States.

If the Secretary were permitted to create grazing districts without limitation it would have been possible for him to have stopped all homesteading. It was testified before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys that the present prospects are, however, that only about 50,000,000 acres would be needed for districts which are contemplated. Consequently it was felt that a degree of assurance might be conveyed to those who still believe that opportunity for homesteading upon the public domain should be maintained, by inserting the amendment, which has the effect of saying to the Secretary, and to all who are interested in the development of the public domain, that only 80,000,000 acres will be affected by the bill without act of Congress. This gives us the assurance that all the public-land laws will continue to apply upon the area which is not included in the grazing districts.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will pardon me, I am not a member of the committee, and I did not know the bill was coming up at this time. I would assume that lands which the Secretary of the Interior would naturally select as those out of which to form districts would be the lands most desirable for homestead purposes.

Mr. ADAMS. That is a fair inference. However, the bill does make provision that lands included within the grazing districts which are more suitable for farming or cultivation than for grazing shall be set aside and segregated and shall be retained open to homestead.

Mr. BORAH. That is a wise provision.

Mr. ADAMS. Among the difficulties which have arisen in the handling of the public domain is this: The settler or the rancher or the homesteader, with his herd or his flock and his fixed habitation, has been in the habit of grazing his flock or herd in the forest reserves in the summer, relying upon the open grazing lands for winter feed. But at times he has found, after bringing his flock or herd from the summer pasturage, that herds or flocks from neighboring States or neighboring localities had been driven in and had consumed the pasturage. Frequently those who have come in have been likewise driven out by intrusions from the outside.

There has been no assurance and no certainty on the part of the homesteader or settler that he might have grazing land and forage for his flock or herd in the summer. That has interfered with him in many ways, among others with his capacity to borrow money, because, lacking the assurance of feed for his animals, it has been more difficult to procure necessary loans.

In the drafting of the bill and of the amendments which have been inserted by the Senate committee, great care has been exercised to preserve all the existing rights to the prospectors, the miners, to those having access to public lands for the construction of irrigation ditches, for fishing and hunting. There has been every effort to protect all existing rights, including rights of way for entry and exit, and including stock-driving ranges.

In the granting of permits upon these districts when created, the bill requires that the Secretary of the Interior shall grant preference to bona fide settlers in the neighborhood for the purpose of protecting those who have really a prior and a more just right to the preferences.

The range in our judgment, as the result of the bill, will be improved and filled up. We are convinced that it will be to the ultimate permanent good of the stock-raising industries of the West which are dependent to a large extent upon these grazing areas.

It should be added that before a grazing district can be created, public notice must be given and a hearing had, so that those who desire to make objection or to make suggestions may be heard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ADAMS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. With regard to the matter of hearings, to which the Senator has just referred, I understand the objectors, if there be objectors, have no power to stay the action of the Secretary of the Interior in creating a district.

Mr. ADAMS. No; no power.

Mr. BORAH. They are simply given an opportunity to be heard but no power to stay the forming of a district.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. That is found, I take it, at the bottom of page 3 and top of page 4, where it is provided:

> Before grazing districts are created in any State as herein provided, a hearing shall be held in the State after public notice thereof shall have been given, at such location convenient for the attendance of State officials, and the settlers, residents, and livestock owners of the vicinity, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior. No such districts shall be established until the expiration of 90 days after such notice shall have been given nor until 20 days after such hearing shall be held: Provided, however,—

And so forth. The only effect of the hearing is simply to inform the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. They have no power to stay his action?

Mr. ADAMS. It is based upon the assumption that the public official having charge of the administration will give heed to the just complaints and suggestions of those directly interested.

That is the substance of the bill. It has many details which it would be needless to explain. I think objections may be illustrated in this way. None of us like to be regulated and that is probably more true in western areas than anywhere else. But the condition has come to prevail where it seems that regulation, irksome though it may be, meddlesome as it will probably be in places, is preferable to overgrazing and lack of regulation which we have—somewhat as in the streets of Washington, where we do not enjoy regulation, and yet traffic would be utterly impossible in the streets if it were unregulated. That condition has come about in western grazing areas.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to his colleague?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask my colleague whether existing homestead laws are interfered with by the proposed legislation?

Mr. ADAMS. They are interfered with to the extent that, within the grazing areas, a homestead may not be filed until application has been made to the Interior Department to classify the land and set it aside; but after application has been made the person making the application has a prior right to file or homestead upon the land which the Interior Department says is suitable for homestead.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Did the committee ascertain any facts or figures as to what proportion of the land is probable homestead land?

Mr. ADAMS. It is said there is very little of it available for successful homesteading. The statement is made that the land has been combed over and over and all the locations which are really suitable, and many others in fact, have been homesteaded, and that there does not seem to be much available homestead land.

Mr. BORAH. Not even under the 640-acre homestead provision?

Mr. ADAMS. No. As a matter of fact, in consideration recently of the drought situation it has been developed that many of those who have gone upon the 640-acre homesteads have been the worst and the first sufferers. They have gone upon land which was so barely adequate to maintain them in fair or good years that they have been perfectly helpless in the bad years.

Mr. BORAH. On page 5, line 10, the bill provides:

> Any willful violation of the provisions of this act or of such rules and regulations thereunder after actual notice thereof shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year.

Would that include such regulations as relate to the trespass of one grazer upon lands assigned to another?

Mr. ADAMS. I assume it would. If the Senator will notice, there are two provisions; one for a penalty for willful violation of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. Then there is a provision for violation of the rules and regulations. That is restricted to "after actual notice thereof." The Senate committee tried to avoid what seemed to be the harshness of the House provision, so as to provide that no man should be punished for violation of a rule or regulation until it should be established that he had had personal notice of the rule or regulation.

Mr. BORAH. I can understand that the phrase "after actual notice thereof" is a very desirable change; but I am thinking of the flockmaster, or the man who has his flock upon the public domain. Although he may have actual notice of the regulation, yet it seems to me it would be very difficult for him to be free from this punishment if he is to be punished every time he trespasses upon the territory of another, because this provision does not require that it shall be willful if it happens at all. So far as the violation of the act is concerned, it must be willful, but it says further "or of such rules and regulations thereof."

Mr. ADAMS. I should think the word "willful" would apply to both. That would be my interpretation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was merely about to suggest that I cannot see how we could possibly construe this language so as to have "violations" apply to both and not have "willful" apply to both.

Mr. BORAH. The reason why I thought so was because of the fact that the words "after actual notice thereof" have been inserted, and the man certainly would not be willfully violating a regulation unless he did have notice of it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; but the language is—

> And any willful violation of the provisions of this Act or of such rules and regulations—

The words "or willful violation of such rules and regulations" must be implied. The phrase "wilful violation" must be inserted before the second clause in any interpretation of the language.

Mr. BORAH. That is perhaps a correct construction; but it seems to me that after the words "after actual notice thereof" were inserted, it was contemplated that the word "willful" did not apply to the rules and regulations.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no; I will say to the Senator that the committee was cognizant of the fact that all persons would be held to have knowledge of the law, but we wanted to make it clear that no such construction could be applied with respect to rules and regulations, and therefore that before there could be any criminal prosecution of a violation of rules and regulations it must be certain that the man had actual notice, and not constructive notice.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but it seems to me it would be rather difficult for the person willfully to violate a regulation that he did not know anything about.

I ask the Senators who framed this measure if they do not think that in this particular kind of measure, where they are dealing with livestock which may pass from one subdivision to another—if these rules and regulations cover that, it would be a pretty harsh rule to subject a man to fine and to imprisonment for the straying of his stock over on to another man's land?

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the Senator from Idaho what he would suggest?

Mr. BORAH. I would suggest to strike out "rules and regulations." It seems to me that in this particular kind of measure, to make a man subject to fine and imprisonment for the violation of rules and regulations makes it almost impossible for him to avoid that kind of punishment.

Mr. ADAMS. Do we not have the same situation now with reference to the forest reserves?

Mr. BORAH. I am not advised as to the details of that, but I think the Senator realizes that when we make people subject to fine and imprisonment for the violation of a regulation it is, on its face, pretty severe. I am opposed to it in principle, but it is peculiarly so when we come to making rules and regulations for the management of livestock. I think the Senator will find that it is going to be a very harsh rule and a very harsh regulation, make it the best we may.

Mr. ADAMS. But does not the Senator recognize that there must be some means of enforcing the rules and regulations?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; there must be a means of enforcing rules and regulations, like canceling the permit, or anything else we want to do; but here we are making the violation of rules and regulations a penal offense. The Secretary of the Interior has ample authority, if he finds that the party is guilty, to protect himself, because he has complete control of the situation in the granting of the license or anything else.

Mr. ADAMS. Let me suggest this case: Suppose I am the owner of a herd. I have no permit, and I proceed to drive my herd in upon the grazing district. I have no permit to be canceled; and if I am free from penalty, what is to prevent me really from trespassing to my own advantage and the detriment of those holding permits and paying for them?

Mr. BORAH. I may be in error as to the matter, but if I understand the bill, the man without a permit or a license would not be there. He is not permitted to go on this land and graze without a permit or license.

Mr. ADAMS. How are we to keep him off if there is no penalty? We have wrestled with some of those problems, I will say to the Senator from Idaho, and I am frank to say that the result has been somewhat unsatisfactory. We have worked out no very adequate solution.

Mr. BORAH. I think the bill discloses that the committee has spent a great deal of time upon this measure, and I have nothing but commendation for the work of the committee. The amendments which have been inserted seem to me altogether to the good. It may be my fundamental horror of making the citizen liable to fine and imprisonment for violating a regulation that does not enable me to see it in the light in which it should be seen.

Mr. ADAMS. Would the feelings of the Senator from Idaho be somewhat relieved if the imprisonment provision were stricken out so far as violation of rules and regulations is concerned?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think that would improve the bill a very great deal, and I think we would have all the power that is needed if we should simply assess a fine.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator from Idaho be good enough to draft an amendment along that line?

Mr. BORAH. I would simply strike out "or by imprisonment."

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I should like to state that there would be no protection for the permittee if that provision with reference to regulations were not left in the bill. A man who had a permit could not protect his holdings.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to pass to another matter before I state my amendment.

I have had numerous letters in regard to this measure from those who style themselves the small users of the public domain. They seem to think that this bill will operate in the interest of the larger holders rather than the small holders. I should like to get the Senator's opinion as to whether or not this bill naturally, in its operation, would operate against the small holder.

Mr. ADAMS. I think not. I should think to the contrary, if anything, when the provisions of the bill in regard to preferences as to permits are considered. Of course, if we had a Secretary of the Interior who was willing to misapply the bill, that might happen. We are always at the mercy of the man having the authority; but I think the purpose as drawn from the bill itself is to the contrary of that impression.

Mr. BORAH. I have here a letter which says:

> If the bill passes, whereby most of the Government land will be withdrawn and put in the control of the Secretary of the Interior, he will undoubtedly lease the land to the highest bidder, and the highest bidder will be certain large cattle and sheep interests, who will divide it up among themselves in accordance with certain strategic positions and in accordance with the control of the water which many of them now have. * * * Unquestionably the little fellows will be shut out entirely—

And so forth.

Mr. ADAMS. It is not contemplated that there will be a lease. A grazing district will be created, as in the case of the forest reserves, and permits will be granted to A to graze 100 head of cattle, and to B to graze 10 head of cattle, and to someone else to graze a different number, and their payments probably will be on a headage basis, as in the case of forest reserves.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may say to the Senator from Idaho that payments are not to be made on a competitive basis.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I may say, in amplification of what the Senator from Colorado has said, that there is no provision at all in the bill for competitive bidding; and, as a matter of fact, there is language here, embraced in one of the amendments proposed by the committee, which I think makes it very certain that these permits shall go to the large or small operators who have the best right to them for the development of their grazing rights. The language to which I refer the Senator will find on page 6:

> Preference shall be given in the issuance of grazing permits to those within or near a district who are landowners engaged in the livestock business, bona fide occupants or settlers, or owners of water or water rights.

In other words, the effort of the committee was to make it as sure as it could that the small man, so-called, as well as the large operator, should have an equal chance. I think there is really no basis for the fear expressed in the communications which the Senator has received.

Mr. BORAH. I hope not. But I entertain a healthy fear for the small business where a bureau is in control.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words regarding this bill, having been one of the members of the subcommittee engaged in working out the various amendments.

I have never favored a leasing bill. I have felt for some time—in fact, I have always felt—that the public lands should pass to the States, thence into private ownership, and should become taxable, and contribute their support to the State and county governments, and aid in the support of the public schools.

If one believes in a leasing bill, this bill is a particularly good bill. It has been carefully worked out by the subcommittee, and every effort has been made to protect the rights of those who are using the public domain as well as settlers.

I can say further that the Secretary of the Interior has been most fair and reasonable in agreeing to and accepting amendments which have been offered by the subcommittee.

The probabilities are that whether this bill becomes a law or not, grazing districts will be established by the Secretary of the Interior. Recently the Solicitor of the Interior Department rendered an opinion to the Secretary in which he advised him that, under the provisions of present laws which provided for the withdrawal of public lands for public purposes, the Secretary has authority to withdraw lands for the purpose of establishing leasing districts, and to prescribe rules and regulations for their management.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the opinion of the Solicitor of the Interior Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
> OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
> Washington, January 25, 1934.
> The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.
> DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Relative to the proposed Executive order for public grazing withdrawal no. 4, Utah, you have requested my opinion as to the legal authority to create grazing districts upon public lands by exercising the Executive withdrawal power and to prescribe Executive regulations governing grazing in districts so created.
>
> It is my opinion that there is legal authority for the creation of grazing districts upon public lands by Executive withdrawal of the lands involved from settlement, location, sale, or entry for the purpose of reserving the lands for federally regulated grazing, and that there is legal authority for Executive regulation of grazing upon the lands so withdrawn.
> I
> The proposed Executive order recites its authority as derived from the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 847). Since, however, the Executive power of withdrawal derives from general nonstatutory sources as well as from statutory sources, I suggest that the order be changed to read as follows:
>
> "By virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States and pursuant to the authority vested in me by the act of June 25, 1910 (ch. 421, 36 Stat. 847), as amended by the act of August 24, 1912 (ch. 369, 37 Stat. 497), and subject to all valid existing rights, it is hereby ordered that the land hereinafter listed insofar as title thereto remains in the United States be, and the same is hereby, withdrawn from settlement, location, sale, or entry and reserved for classification, in aid of legislation, for conservation and development of natural resources and for use as grazing land in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."
> The leading case of United States v. Midwest Oil Co. (1915) (236 U.S. 459, 471, 483) definitely recognized the existence, independent of statutory grant, of the President's power to order withdrawal of public lands from private acquisition. This case involved the validity of "Temporary petroleum withdrawal no. 5", proclaimed by the President on September 27, 1909. Subsequent to its proclamation and before the Midwest Oil Co. case, the President's power in the premises was questioned; and in a message to Congress the President called attention to the existence of the doubt and suggested the desirability of legislation expressly granting the power and ratifying what he had already done. There resulted the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 847). In the Midwest Oil Co. case, however, the Court held that, as to the 1909 withdrawal, "The act left the rights of parties in the position of these appellees to be determined by the state of the law when the proclamation was issued." This express holding on the effect of the act of 1910 definitely limited the Court's decision to determination of the withdrawal power vested in the President independent of statute.
> On the question of the President's nonstatutory withdrawal power the Court concluded, "As heretofore pointed out, the long-continued practice, the acquiescence of Congress, as well as the decisions of the courts, all show that the President had the power to make the order." Mr. Justice Lamar's opinion for the Court described exhaustively the long-continued administrative practice, in which "there had been, prior to 1910, at least 252 Executive orders making reservations for useful, though nonstatutory purposes." The opinion pointed out that not one of those withdrawals was disaffirmed by Congress, that in many instances Congress enacted legislation in assistance of the purposes for which withdrawals were made and that not one of those withdrawals was declared invalid by the courts. The holding in this case, after the exhaustive consideration of the question by the Court, established with certainty in constitutional law the Executive's withdrawal power, independent of statute.
> The Midwest Oil Co. case was followed in Mason v. United States (1923) (260 U.S. 545, 553), in which a 1908 Executive order withdrawing certain lands in Louisiana was upheld. Mr. Justice Sutherland in his opinion for an unanimous court stated:

"Whatever legitimate doubts existed at the time of the locations respecting the validity of the Executive order, were resolved by the subsequent decision of this Court in United States v. Midwest Oil Co. (236 U.S. 459), where it was held that a similar order, issued in 1909, was within the power of the Executive. Upon the authority of that case the order here in question must be held valid."

The Executive power of withdrawal, both under the act of 1910 and under the state of law existing prior to that act, has been recognized in several United States Supreme Court cases (United States v. Wilbur, 283 U.S. 414, 419; Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263; Kinney Coastal Oil Co. v. Keiffer, 277 U.S. 488, 490).

Among the many decisions in the lower Federal courts sanctioning the Executive withdrawal power, Shaw v. Work (9 Fed. 2d, 1014, 1015), certiorari denied (270 U.S. 642) is outstanding. There it was held that under the act of 1910 the President could withdraw public lands for purposes which by provision of the same statute could be accomplished only by means of legislation and that such a withdrawal remained effective notwithstanding the failure in Congress of the necessary legislation.

The decisions referred to above show definite judicial sanction of the Executive power of withdrawal, whether its basis be nonstatutory or statutory.

Section 1 of the act of 1910 provides:

"That the President may, at any time in his discretion, temporarily withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry any of the public lands of the United States, including the District of Alaska and reserve the same for water-power sites, irrigation, classification of lands, or other public purposes to be specified in the orders of withdrawals, and such withdrawals or reservations shall remain in force until revoked by him or by an act of Congress."

The statutory enumeration of certain purposes for reservation is followed by the omnibus clause, "or for other public purposes to be specified in the orders of withdrawals", so that the statute may properly be construed as declaratory of the general nonstatutory power. An Executive order withdrawing public lands for any public purpose may, therefore, with legal propriety rely for authority upon both the nonstatutory and the statutory powers.

It cannot be questioned that withdrawal of public lands for the purpose of reserving them for use as Federally regulated grazing lands is a withdrawal for a public purpose. Congressional determination supports this conclusion. Section 10 of the act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 862), an act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, provides:

"SEC. 10. That lands containing water holes or other bodies of water needed or used by the public for watering purposes shall not be designated under this act, but may be reserved under the provisions of the act of June 25, 1910, and such lands heretofore or hereafter reserved shall, while so reserved, be kept and held open to the public use for such purposes under such general rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary may, in his discretion, also withdraw from entry lands necessary to insure access by the public to watering places reserved hereunder and needed for use in the movement of stock to summer and winter ranges or to shipping points, and may prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the proper administration and use of such lands."

I have made particular reference herein to the proposed order's purpose of creating a grazing district because the second question herein considered is concerned with regulations of the use of the withdrawn lands for grazing. The other purposes expressed in the proposed order are expressly recognized in the act of 1910 or may be included in the act's omnibus phrase "other public purposes."

Although the act of 1910 makes certain exceptions to the effect of withdrawals and, although the proposed order subjects the withdrawal "to all valid existing rights", neither the statute nor the order would protect against the withdrawal's effect those who are using the lands involved for grazing stock at the sufferance of the landowner, the United States.

Protection under section 2 of the act of 1910 would not be available, unless the lands for which protection was claimed were at the date of the withdrawal embraced in any lawful homestead or desert-land entry theretofore made, or upon which any valid settlement has been made and is at said date being maintained and perfected pursuant to law" (36 Stat. 847, 848). Nor would mere use of the lands for grazing, at the sufferance of the United States, be sufficient to establish a valid existing right to which the proposed withdrawal is declared subject. The only right of those so using the lands is to graze stock upon the land so long as the United States suffers them to do so (Buford v. Houtz, 133 U.S. 320). The proposed withdrawal order would terminate the sufferance. There is direct authority for this position in Omaechevarria v. Idaho (246 U.S. 343, 352), which held constitutional an Idaho statute that regulated the United States public lands located in Idaho as between those grazing cattle thereon and those grazing sheep thereon. In affirming the Idaho Supreme Court decision upholding the act against objections made by sheep owners, Mr. Justice Brandeis stated in his opinion for the Court:

"This exclusion of sheep owners under certain circumstances does not interfere with any rights of a citizen of the United States. Congress has not conferred upon citizens the right to graze stock upon the public lands. The Government has merely suffered the lands to be so used (Buford v. Houtz, supra). It is because the citizen possesses no such right that it was held by this Court that the Secretary of Agriculture might, in the exercise of his general power to regulate forest reserves, exclude sheep and cattle therefrom (United States v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 506; Light v. United States, 220 U.S. 523)."

The proposed withdrawal order necessarily would terminate the sufferance by the United States of the present grazing upon its public lands. The proposed withdrawal derives its authority under the act of 1910 from any one or a combination of the purposes expressed in the proposed order, i.e., "for classification" and "in aid of legislation." The Federal courts have repeatedly held that an appropriation of public lands for a public purpose by proper governmental action prevents the further use of the withdrawn lands by private persons for any purpose which is in conflict with the purpose for which the withdrawal was made. Case law supports this position. United States v. Tygh Valley Land & Livestock Co. (76 Fed. 693); Shannon v. United States (160 Fed. 870) (grazing on lands appropriated for a specified public purpose deemed inconsistent with the purpose, and therefore unlawful and subject to being restrained, notwithstanding Buford v. Houtz, 133 U.S. 320); Scott v. Carew (196 U.S. 100); United States v. Hodges (218 Fed. 87); Stockley v. United States (271 Fed. 632).

Examination of the pertinent case law and statute law makes it clear that the President has the power to make the proposed withdrawal order, and that the order would be effective to terminate the unregulated grazing on the public lands involved.

There is no specific legislative authorization for the Secretary of the Interior's regulation of Federal grazing districts, but specific legislative authorization is not needed. The proposed order's designation of the Secretary of the Interior as the official to regulate grazing upon the lands withdrawn clearly places the lands under his jurisdiction, and this designation of jurisdiction or regulatory authority is consonant with the Secretary's "general powers over the public lands as guardian of the people." And, having jurisdiction over the land withdrawn, the Secretary of the Interior, by virtue of his general authority, may prescribe such rules and regulations as are necessary to effectuate the public purposes for which the withdrawal and reservation are made.

There is a general statutory authorization of appropriate regulation by the Secretary of the Interior in the execution of those land laws not otherwise specially provided for. In title 43 of the United States Code (which contains the public-land laws, including the act of 1910 relied upon in the proposed order) section 1201 provides:

"The Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to enforce and carry into execution, by appropriate regulations, every part of the provisions of this title not otherwise specially provided for."

Rules and regulations which had no statutory basis of authority other than the section set forth above have been given judicial sanction by the Supreme Court of the United States (Caha v. United States, 152 U.S. 211, 216; Roughton v. Knight, 219 U.S. 537).

When the general authorization of executive regulation (R.S. 2478, 43 U.S.C. 1201) is considered in the light of the withdrawal power granted in the act of 1910 (36 Stat. 847, 43 U.S.C. 141), and elaborated in section 10 of the Stock-Raising Homestead Act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 862, 43 U.S.C. 300), the inevitable conclusion is that the Secretary of the Interior has legislative authority to prescribe such regulations for public lands withdrawn, under the act of 1910, as are necessary and proper to effectuate the public purposes of the withdrawals.

This conclusion is borne out by judicial pronouncements of the general powers of the Secretary of the Interior over the public lands (Williams v. United States, 138 U.S. 514, 524; United States v. Wilbur, 283 U.S. 414, 419).

Finally, since effective exercise of the well-established executive withdrawal power requires the concomitant power to regulate for the purposes for which the withdrawn lands are reserved, policy favors the legal conclusion I have reached.

Respectfully,

NATHAN R. MARGOLD, Solicitor.

Approved January 25, 1934.

T. A. WALTERS,
First Assistant Secretary.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I also have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior which I think confirms my fears that grazing districts will be established without any further law if we do not pass the bill we are now considering. I will read that letter. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, Feb. 10, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT D. CAREY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAREY: In view of your interest in matters relating to the public domain and referring particularly to a protest submitted to the President by Hon. VINCENT CARTER, Member of Congress from your State, against the issuance of an Executive order withdrawing the public lands from their present grazing uses, I feel that you should be informed that I do not at present contemplate asking the President to issue a general order withdrawing the public lands for grazing-control purposes. I favor passage of the Taylor bill, H.R. 6462, with which you are familiar, and shall continue to urge its enactment.

For some time the question of the authority of the President, without congressional action, by Executive order to withdraw these lands for grazing and regulate their use for that purpose has been under consideration. As you are doubtless aware the President has announced that he had exercised that authority and signed an Executive order withdrawing a gross area of approximately 1,200,000 acres of land in the desert range of west central Utah responsive to the petition of local range users.

The withdrawal is for the expressed purpose of classification, in aid of legislation, for conservation and development of natural resources and for use as grazing land in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Pending action on the Taylor bill, withdrawals of this character will be resorted to when found necessary, largely upon the application of local users of the range.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. President, in view of this letter, and the opinion of the Solicitor of the Interior Department, I believe that it is perhaps better for the West to accept this legislation, which carefully guards the rights of the users of the range, than to have leasing put into effect with no law whatever. If such a thing were done, we would take the chance of some Secretary of the Interior prescribing unfair rules and regulations. There would not be the restriction of his power or the protection of any rights which are carefully guarded in this bill.

While I am not in favor of any leasing bill and will vote against this bill if there is a roll call, it is possible, considering the determination of the Secretary to establish grazing districts, that those of us who represent the public-domain States should accept this bill as the best we can get at this time. However, it must not be taken as a final settlement of the public-land question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the remarks of my colleague [Mr. CAREY], and I desire to state that, like him, I have come to feel that the enactment of the pending bill is very highly desirable from the point of view of those who are interested in the most beneficial development of what remains of the public domain. I think it will be beneficial to the livestock industry as a whole, and to the people of the public-land States in general.

The demand for this legislation began many years ago. A bill somewhat like the one before us was introduced several years ago in the House of Representatives by a Member of Congress from the State of Utah. At the hearings which were held upon the pending bill there appeared representatives from various States who urged the enactment of the measure.

In Wyoming there are many who likewise feel that the bill should be enacted. I have received letters from some opposed, but I have had many letters also from those who urge this action. Because of the growing feeling among so many residents of many of the Western States that there should be action, I feel that, in the event that Congress should adjourn without enacting the bill, we would be certain to have withdrawal by Executive action; and if we had withdrawal by Executive action, we would have the rules and regulations for the administration of the grazing districts put into effect by the Secretary of the Interior or by whatever official was charged with the duty of administering the districts. In other words, the rules and regulations under which the grazing districts would be administered would be those which were defined by executive officials in the bureaus, without the advantage of the public comment and the public control which would be exerted through the terms of the pending bill.

OBJECTIONABLE PROVISIONS REMOVED

Mr. President, as the measure came from the House it contained many provisions which seemed to me to be objectionable, or, at least, seemed to be open to the possibility of abuse in administration. But the committee devoted several weeks to an intensive study of the measure, and the amendments which have been proposed, and which will be submitted by the committee, will, in my judgment, make the bill a beneficial one for all of the public-land States.

I think that there can be no argument that it is far wiser, from the point of view of our Western States, to have public grazing administered under the restrictions contained in this measure than under the broad powers of an Executive order. This bill has been, in effect, redrafted since it came to the Senate, but by the friends of development in the West. It is only proper that I should here say that Secretary Ickes has shown every disposition to cooperate with us. I believe that he will administer this measure to the satisfaction of the West.

Amendments have been added by the committee to limit the application of this bill to less than one-half of the remaining unreserved, unappropriated public domain. Amendments have been added to protect every right initiated under any existing public-land law and to make certain that the power and authority of any State will not be diminished as to matters within its jurisdiction. Care has been taken, for example, to provide that the right to hunt or fish within a grazing district in accordance with the laws of any State and of the United States shall not be affected.

Other amendments safeguard water rights and mining rights. Provision was made by the Senate committee to require public notice and a public hearing at a location convenient for State officials and others interested to attend before any district may be created.

The right of a State to exchange lands inside or outside of the boundaries of a grazing district is protected by another amendment.

In order to make certain that lands should not be improperly classified to cut off the right of homesteading, a mandatory amendment was adopted requiring the Secretary to classify any tract not exceeding 320 acres in area for which any qualified entryman should make application and providing that the filing of the application should entitle the applicant to a preference right to enter the lands in the event that they should be open to entry.

HOMESTEADING FALLING OFF

Mr. President, it might be worth while to call attention to the fact that homesteading upon the public domain has been gradually ceasing to be an effective means of passing title to the public lands into private ownership. There was presented at the hearing, at the request of the committee, a statement from the General Land Office showing the number of homestead entries which have been made in the last 16 years. In 1919, for example, there were forty-one-thousand-and-odd entries upon the public domain for homestead purposes. In 1933 the number had decreased to 7,769.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, from what page of the hearings is the Senator reading?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am referring to page 12 of the hearings before the Senate committee.

An examination of the table in the hearing shows that there has been a steady decrease not only in the number of homestead entries made but also in the number of homestead entries which have been patented. There has been a decline in the proportion of patented claims to original entries, thus showing that an increasing number of homesteaders have been finding it unprofitable to complete their entries. For example, in 1919, when 41,000 entries were made, 38,800 homesteads were patented, but in 1933, when 7,769 entries were made, only 3,664 entries were patented. In other words, these figures conclusively demonstrate that the area in the public-land States which is susceptible to homestead entry has been greatly decreased.

I ask unanimous consent to have the figures to which I have been referring inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the figures were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTE.—Attention is directed to the fact that the data as to patented entries do not involve entries allowed during the corresponding fiscal year. Inasmuch as residence is ordinarily required for 3 years and the life of the entry is usually limited to 5 years, it accordingly follows that the entries patented during any particular year were allowed during the preceding 3 to 5 years.

The figures relating to homesteads canceled and relinquished cannot be given with any degree of accuracy. Our records of entries canceled because of failure to submit final proof within the period allowed by statute, of entries canceled for cause, and of entries canceled upon relinquishments, include all classes of entries, and the relinquishment record also includes partial relinquishments as well as relinquishments of entire entries. Furthermore such records relate to number of entries only (no data as to areas involved), being compiled merely for monthly work-report purposes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the great bulk of the land which remains is grazing land.

I also ask to have incorporated a table from page 50 of the hearing, showing the classification of the grazing lands in the various States.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPORTANCE OF DEVELOPING WATER

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, there is another factor, however, which I think should give us a great deal of concern. That has to do with the development of the water resources upon the remaining public domain. If this bill is not enacted, I do not know how the water resources can be effectively developed, certainly not under existing law.

Only this morning the Senate passed a bill, which I introduced a few days ago, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make use of water discovered in wells which are drilled for the production of oil or gas. That bill, now in the House, if it shall be passed there, and the pending bill, if it shall be passed here, will enable the public-land States for the first time in history to have a well-rounded program for the development of water resources on the public domain. Such a program would be of incalculable value to the people of my State.

Upon inquiry from the Geological Survey I find that, in the opinion of that Bureau, the proper utilization of the grazing resources on the public domain will require the development of not less than 8,000 stock-watering places. Of these 2,000, it is estimated, will be wells and 6,000 will be tanks or reservoirs.

It seems to me, therefore, that this is an opportunity for the development of the grazing area in the public-domain States which we cannot well forego; and much as I would prefer to see the remaining public domain pass over to the States for development by the respective States, I recognize the fact that the temper of Congress is such that a bill of that kind cannot be passed at this time.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, with respect to the question submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], is it not the judgment of the Senator from Wyoming that as to grazing rights and waters the man of moderate means will be better taken care of under Federal supervision than leaving the domain as it is or passing it to the States?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is certainly my opinion so far as the present system goes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I desire to ask someone who knows—and I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] probably knows better than any other Senator—whether there has been any exhaustive study with regard to the advantage or disadvantage of the Government doing away with its public-land policy and making a conveyance to the States of the lands which lie within the borders of the States.

It strikes me, as I have followed the problem for years, that while it is perfectly legitimate, it does seem to be an anomaly for the Federal Government to own land within the limits of a State. While I confess I am perfectly ignorant on the subject, my first impression is that we ought to discontinue that policy, and the Federal Government ought to transfer the public land into the hands of the States, where the public lands belong.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator permit me to attempt to answer that question?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, that question is one of the most refreshing, encouraging, and heartening I have heard on the floor of the Senate for years, and it is particularly gratifying and significant that the query should have been made by the learned Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, I am in favor of, and have always been in favor of, the Government extinguishing its title or ownership, not sovereignty, of course, but its ownership or title to the public lands and relinquishing or granting the same to the States, so that the States may get the lands on the tax rolls.

The Senator, of course, being a historian, knows that the State of Texas retained her own land when she came into the Union. The Senator knows that to each State as it was admitted was granted considerable tracts of the public land in aid of the public schools, and so forth. And in my judgment, if the grasp of the Federal Government over the public domain could be relaxed and the lands passed to the States, it would be one of the most, if not the most, beneficent act that Congress could pass.

The States are under a sort of coercion, or under a sort of absentee landlordism.

The Senator from Idaho pointed a moment ago to the fact that a man with a herd of cattle or a flock of sheep might trespass unwittingly upon the public domain or upon somebody else's grazing ground and would be subject to a fine administered by somebody sitting in Washington, not by a jury of the vicinage, and I regret to say that no European Government, unless it be one that I will not mention, deals more autocratically and more unjustly with its nationals who are attempting to secure homes and secure homesteads and mining rights than does the United States Government with its citizens who are far away from the seat of power here.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, what was in my mind was that whatever wealth might accrue to the Federal Government from the treasures, such as minerals, and so on, if that were turned over to the States it would be the wealth of the United States anyway, possessed by its citizens in the States.

Mr. ASHURST. Exactly; and the present system has caused many States to lean upon the Federal Government for sustenance and support. Instead of having strong States with much land on the tax roll, we have sitting in Washington bureaucrats far removed and far absent from the tenant, administering these lands, but serenely oblivious to the great problems connected therewith; and nothing can break down the walls of ignorance that surround the ordinary bureaucrats regarding public lands.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] for interrupting him. I know he would have made a better reply than I could.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, no one could have made a better reply than the gracious and eloquent Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

I might say in addition to what he has stated, however, that the sentiment which has made itself manifest in both Houses of Congress with respect to the disposition of the minerals on the public domain has convinced me that at this time it would be impossible to hope for the passage of an act conveying the lands to the States. I should like to see such an act passed, because I know from my own experience that the Western States are well able to handle the public lands. I know for example that the State of Wyoming had a leasing system whereby all the people of that State shared, through royalties, in the development of the mineral wealth long before the Federal Government had a leasing system. The proposal was at one time made that the lands might be conveyed to the States but without the mineral rights. The general sentiment of the West is that it is not willing to accept a shell. If the lands are to be conveyed, they should be conveyed with the mineral resources as well as the surface rights. If the lands are to be conveyed, the States should receive a full title. But because Congress is not yet ready, apparently, to convey the mineral resources with the surface, we must await further opportunity to educate our eastern brethren.

This bill provides for the creation of grazing districts pending final disposal of the lands—an amendment, by the way, which was suggested by my distinguished colleague—so that the question remains open. Let me say to the Senator that if he returns to this body, and if I return, I shall probably remind him of the opinion he has expressed today.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, coming from one of the public-land States, I have been greatly interested in this particular bill. The feature that has just been under discussion, that of ceding the public lands to the States, is what I have desired, and what the people of my State want. We have long desired to have the lands turned over to the administration of the State, not only that we might receive the revenues from the lands but that they might the better be gotten into private ownership.

The State of New Mexico has been very successful in the administration of the lands which belong to it, and those who entertain any doubt or fear about the Western States not being able properly to care for the public land if it shall be turned over to them I think are wrong in that doubt, because all those States—especially my State, with which I am most familiar—can and will take care of the public lands.

Having that thought, at first I was somewhat opposed to the pending bill, because I feared it might interfere with the ultimate turning over of the lands to the States; but there is nothing in the bill which will prevent Congress taking such action at some future time.

As the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] has just explained, it does not seem possible to have such a bill passed at this session of the Congress. If it were possible of course that would be the solution so far as the Western States are concerned.

It is apparent in my State that the public domain does need regulation. The present bill has been carefully worked out by the committee, and will prevent many things which have been injurious to the public domain.

It does not seem to me that the bill can be so interpreted that the large cattleman or sheepman, as has been suggested, may secure control of the public domain and exclude the small man. If that were so, I should vote against it; but there is nothing in the bill as I see it, which will bring about such a result.

Another phase of the bill which is particularly interesting to most of the Western States is the homestead provision. Some think that under this bill there will be no further homesteading. The bill provides that even though the lands are withdrawn, those lands which are chiefly valuable for agriculture shall be so classified by the Secretary, and then shall be open to homestead under the public-land laws of the United States.

There is only one provision in the bill which I think may prevent carrying out that policy, and I may offer an amendment to cure that defect later at the proper time; but the bill, as a whole, does not prevent homesteading; it does not give control to the large cattle raisers to the exclusion of the small ones, and, in my opinion, there is nothing which will prevent Congress ultimately turning these lands over to the States.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOUISIANA FOR LAKE PONTCHARTRAIN CANAL

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not opposing the pending bill. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to one of the things which should be done in connection with the transferring of these public lands. The State of Louisiana has borne most of the expense of creating these public lands. Contrary to what the public generally thinks, the domain in these public territories was derived almost wholly from cessions made through the State of Louisiana, particularly the Louisiana Purchase. The freedom of Texas was likewise accomplished largely through the intervention and assistance of citizens of Louisiana, and many of the benefits which today inure to the public generally, whether they go to the Federal Government or to the State governments, may largely be attributable to the efforts of Louisiana citizens. I have always believed that whenever land transfers were made back to the States, as an act of popular recognition, the citizens of Louisiana should be allowed to have some preemptory right of homestead in them. However, we will not contend for that; but there is one thing, Mr. President, which I am going to bring up here in the next Congress, of which I wish to give notice at this session of Congress, and I might as well give notice at this time as at any other time.

It had been advocated for many years by the Federal Government that there should be a canal built between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River.

As early as the days of Robert Fulton, when Mr. William Dearborn was Secretary of War, before the invention of the steamboat by Fulton, he was sent on an expedition down the mouth of the Mississippi River in order that he might make a survey and submit a report as to what should be done for the benefit of the national defense and for navigation in the interior of the United States. Fulton's report, made at that time to the Secretary of War and likewise communicated to the Congress, I presume, and to the President of the United States, recommended the building of a canal between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River, in order that that great arm of the sea, Lake Pontchartrain, beginning in the city of New Orleans and extending to the Gulf, might be available for short routes and for connections between the waters of the Mississippi and the Gulf itself.

The United States Government was supposed to build that canal, and it was the duty of the United States Government to build that canal. A precedent may be found in the case of a canal of similar kind built in Massachusetts, which, I believe is called the "Cape Cod Canal." In that instance the United States Government took over the canal and reimbursed the parties for their cost, although it was not considered anything like as important as the building of a canal between Lake Pontchartrain and the Mississippi River. As I say, it was a matter of national navigation, a matter of national defense that the Mississippi River should be connected through Lake Pontchartrain as an arm of the sea.

That project waited upon the Federal Government, which had been investigating it for a number of years. Finally when the war came on the people of Louisiana were appealed to to take steps to build a canal connecting Lake Pontchartrain with the Mississippi River. Naturally it was under the expectation that whenever the United States had severed itself from the entanglements of the war the State of Louisiana would be reimbursed for its expenditure on this work of national necessity. So the people of Louisiana expended in the neighborhood of $25,000,000 in order to construct this valuable improvement for the defense of the United States Government and for the development of its internal waterways.

We have waited a long time hoping the day might come when our State would be reimbursed for the $25,000,000 which it has expended as a result of national necessities, national defense, and national conveniences. At every session of Congress, when they have undertaken to make some move or to get some steps taken in order that the State might be relieved of that burden of $25,000,000 which it assumed to carry on a national work, there has always been some emergency or some paralysis of Federal funds, so that the recommendation has always been to us, "Let it go by until the next Congress; the Treasury is not in shape to expend the money at this time."

Mr. President, we have been and are paying on those bonds a considerable amount of money. We are having to pay an annual interest rate of from 4½ to 5 percent. We are having to make retirements on those bonds, and there are still over $20,000,000 of those bonds outstanding, unpaid, and as yet the Federal Government has said nothing about taking them up.

We have felt some pride about urging this question ourselves. We had hoped that the Military Affairs Committee or the Appropriations Committee, through the ingenuity and activity of someone outside our State, would make the necessary move for the Government to take off the people of Louisiana the burden they incurred because of the national defense. Many States owe us that much. We had hoped that it would not ever be necessary for any Member of the Senate or of the other House from Louisiana to make this move; but apparently, Mr. President, the motion to have the Government reimburse Louisiana for an expenditure made for national defense and national convenience and the development of the internal-waterway system of the United States will have to be made by a Senator from that State.

So, Mr. President, at the next Congress, unless the action shall be taken by some of my colleagues in this body or by someone in the other House, I will undertake to secure an appropriation or some action on the part of the Government by which it will take over the obligation incurred by the State of Louisiana on behalf of and for the benefit of the United States.

REGULATION OF PUBLIC GRAZING LANDS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6462) to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the Senate in a short time and I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado in charge of the bill if he would be willing to consider at this time an amendment striking out the following language on page 5, line 13:

> Or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

If that amendment were agreed to the bill would read at that point—

> Shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $500, in the discretion of the court.

It seems to me that a $500 fine is ample punishment, and I should like to strike out the provision relating to punishment by imprisonment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, such an amendment will be acceptable to me.

Mr. BORAH. I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho is agreed to.

The amendments reported by the committee will now be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was, in section 1, page 1, after line 2, to strike out: "That in order to promote the highest use of public land, the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion is hereby authorized to establish by order, grazing districts or additions thereto from any part of the public lands of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, not in national forests, national parks and monuments, Indian reservations, or revested Oregon-California Railroad grant lands, or other revested grant lands in Oregon, and which in his opinion are chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, and/or to modify the boundaries thereof", and in lieu thereof to insert: "That in order to promote the highest use of the public lands pending its final disposal, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, by order to establish grazing districts or additions thereto and/or to modify the boundaries thereof, not exceeding in the aggregate an area of 80,000,000 acres of vacant, unappropriated, and unreserved lands from any part of the public domain of the United States (exclusive of Alaska), which are not in national forests, national parks and monuments, Indian reservations, revested Oregon and California Railroad grant lands, or revested Coos Bay Wagon Road grant lands, and which in his opinion are chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops"; on page 2, line 21, after the word "thereof", to strike out "such orders shall be so worded as to safeguard valid claims existing on the date thereof and shall not"; on page 2, line 23, after the word "not" to insert "Nothing in this act shall be construed in any way to diminish, restrict, or impair any right which has been heretofore or may be hereafter initiated under existing law, and which is maintained pursuant to law except as otherwise expressly provided in this act, nor to"; on page 3, line 5, after the word "State" to insert ", nor as limiting or restricting the power or authority of any State as to matters within its jurisdiction. Whenever any grazing district is established pursuant to this act, the Secretary shall grant to owners of land adjacent to such district, upon application of any such owner, such rights-of-way over the lands included in such district for stock-driving purposes as may be necessary for the convenient access by any such owner to marketing facilities or to lands not within such district owned by such person or upon which such person has stock-grazing rights"; on page 3, line 22, after the numerals "471", to insert "as amended"; in line 24, after the word "specify", to insert "Before grazing districts are created in any State as herein provided, a hearing shall be held in the State, after public notice thereof shall have been given, at such location convenient for the attendance of State officials, and the settlers, residents, and livestock owners of the vicinity, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior. No such district shall be established until the expiration of 90 days after such notice shall have been given, nor until 20 days after such hearing shall be held: Provided, however, That the publication of such notice shall have the effect of withdrawing all public lands within the exterior boundary of such proposed grazing districts from all forms of entry of settlement. Nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way altering or restricting the right to hunt or fish within a grazing district in accordance with the laws of the United States or of any State, or as vesting in any permittee any right whatsoever to interfere with hunting or fishing within a grazing district", so as to make the section read:

That in order to promote the highest use of the public lands pending its final disposal, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, by order to establish grazing districts or additions thereto and/or to modify the boundaries thereof, not exceeding in the aggregate an area of 80,000,000 acres of vacant, unappropriated, and unreserved lands from any part of the public domain of the United States (exclusive of Alaska), which are not in national forests, national parks and monuments, Indian reservations, revested Oregon & California Railroad grant lands, or revested Coos Bay Wagon Road grant lands, and which in his opinion are chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops: Provided, That no lands withdrawn or reserved for any other purpose shall be included in any such district except with the approval of the head of the department having jurisdiction thereof. Nothing in this act shall be construed in any way to diminish, restrict, or impair any right which has been heretofore or may be hereafter initiated under existing law, and which is maintained pursuant to law except as otherwise expressly provided in this act, nor to affect any land heretofore or hereafter surveyed which, except for the provisions of this act, would be a part of any grant to any State, nor as limiting or restricting the power or authority of any State as to matters within its jurisdiction. Whenever any grazing district is established pursuant to this act, the Secretary shall grant to owners of land adjacent to such district, upon application of any such owner, such rights-of-way over the lands included in such district for stock-driving purposes as may be necessary for the convenient access by any such owner to marketing facilities or to lands not within such district owned by such person or upon which such person has stock-grazing rights. Neither this act nor the act of December 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 862; U.S.C., title 43, secs. 291 and following), commonly known as the "Stock Raising Homestead Act", shall be construed as limiting the authority or policy of Congress or the President to include in national forests public lands of the character described in section 24 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. 1103; U.S.C., title 16, sec. 471), as amended, for the purposes set forth in the act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stat. 35; U.S.C., title 16, sec. 475), or such other purposes as Congress may specify. Before grazing districts are created in any State as herein provided, a hearing shall be held in the State, after public notice thereof shall have been given, at such location convenient for the attendance of State officials, and the settlers, residents, and livestock owners of the vicinity, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior. No such district shall be established until the expiration of 90 days after such notice shall have been given, nor until 20 days after such hearing shall be held: Provided, however, That the publication of such notice shall have the effect of withdrawing all public lands within the exterior boundary of such proposed grazing districts from all forms of entry of settlement. Nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way altering or restricting the right to hunt or fish within a grazing district in accordance with the laws of the United States or of any State, or as vesting in any permittee any right whatsoever to interfere with hunting or fishing within a grazing district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 5, line 4, after the word "range", to strike out "and to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the use of such public grazing lands"; in line 10, after the word "any", to insert "willful"; in line 11, after the word "or", to insert "of"; and in line 12, after the word "thereunder", to insert "after actual notice thereof", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior shall make provision for the protection, administration, regulation, and improvement of such grazing districts as may be created under the authority of the foregoing section, and he shall make such rules and regulations and establish such service, enter into such cooperative agreements, and do any and all things necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act and to insure the objects of such grazing districts, namely, to regulate their occupancy and use, to preserve the land and its resources from destruction or unnecessary injury, to provide for the orderly use, improvement, and development of the range; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to continue the study of erosion and flood control and to perform such work as may be necessary amply to protect and rehabilitate the areas subject to the provisions of this act, through such funds as may be made available for that purpose, and any willful violation of the provisions of this act or of such rules and regulations thereunder after actual notice thereof shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 22, after the word "time", to strike out "under his authority"; on page 6, line 1, after the word "and", to strike out "preference shall be given occupants and settlers on land within or near a district to such range privileges as may be needed to permit proper use of lands occupied by them. Such permits may be issued to individuals, groups, associations, or corporations authorized to conduct a livestock business under the laws of the State in which the grazing district is located for" and to insert: "to groups, associations, or corporations authorized to conduct business under the laws of the State in which the grazing district is located. Preference shall be given in the issuance of grazing permits to those within or near a district who are landowners engaged in the livestock business, bona fide occupants or settlers, or owners of water or water rights, as may be necessary to permit the proper use of lands, water, or water rights owned, occupied, or leased by them, except that until July 1, 1935, no preference shall be given in the issuance of such permits to any such owner, occupant, or settler, whose rights were acquired between January 1, 1934, and December 31, 1934, both dates inclusive. Such permits shall be for"; on page 7, line 5, after the word "exists", to strike out "And provided further, That in such orders, and in administering this act, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes, vested and accrued and which are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of the courts, shall be maintained and protected in the possessors and owners thereof, and, so far as consistent with the purposes of this act, grazing rights similarly recognized and acknowledged, shall be adequately safeguarded" and in lieu thereof to insert "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed or administered in any way to diminish or impair any right to the possession and use of water for mining, agriculture, manufacturing, or other purposes which has heretofore vested or accrued under existing law or which may be hereafter initiated or acquired and maintained in accordance with law. So far as consistent with the purposes and provisions of this act, grazing privileges recognized and acknowledged shall be adequately safeguarded, but the creation of a grazing district or the issuance of a permit pursuant to the provisions of this act shall not create any right, title, interest, or estate in or to the lands", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue or cause to be issued permits to graze livestock on such grazing districts to such bona fide settlers, residents, and other stock owners as under his rules and regulations are entitled to participate in the use of the range, upon the payment annually of reasonable fees in each case to be fixed or determined from time to time: Provided, That grazing permits shall be issued only to citizens of the United States or to those who have filed the necessary declaration of intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws and to groups, associations, or corporations authorized to conduct business under the laws of the State in which the grazing district is located. Preference shall be given in the issuance of grazing permits to those within or near a district who are landowners engaged in the livestock business, bona fide occupants or settlers, or owners of water or water rights, as may be necessary to permit the proper use of lands, water, or water rights owned, occupied, or leased by them, except that until July 1, 1935, no preference shall be given in the issuance of such permits to any such owner, occupant, or settler whose rights were acquired between January 1, 1934, and December 31, 1934, both dates inclusive. Such permits shall be for a period of not more than 10 years, subject to the preference right of the permittees to renewal in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall specify from time to time numbers of stock and seasons of use. During periods of range depletion due to severe drought or other natural causes, or in case of a general epidemic of disease, during the life of the permit, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion to remit, reduce, refund in whole or in part, or authorize postponement of payment of grazing fees for such depletion period so long as the emergency exists: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed or administered in any way to diminish or impair any right to the possession and use of water for mining, agriculture, manufacturing, or other purposes which has heretofore vested or accrued under existing law or which may be hereafter initiated or acquired and maintained in accordance with law. So far as consistent with the purposes and provisions of this act, grazing privileges recognized and acknowledged shall be adequately safeguarded, but the creation of a grazing district or the issuance of a permit pursuant to the provisions of this act shall not create any right, title, interest, or estate in or to the lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 8, line 6, after the word "approved", to insert "Permittees shall be required by the Secretary of the Interior to comply with the provisions of law of the State within which the grazing district is located with respect to the cost and maintenance of partition fences"; and in line 13, after the word "occupant", to strike out "a reasonable pro rata value for the use of such improvements. If the parties interested cannot agree, then the amount of such payment shall" and insert "the reasonable value of such improvements to", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. Fences, wells, reservoirs, and other improvements necessary to the care and management of the permitted livestock may be constructed on the public lands within such grazing districts under permit issued by the authority of the Secretary, or under such cooperative arrangement as the Secretary may approve. Permittees shall be required by the Secretary of the Interior to comply with the provisions of law of the State within which the grazing district is located with respect to the cost and maintenance of partition fences. No permit shall be issued which shall entitle the permittee to the use of such improvements constructed and owned by a prior occupant until the applicant has paid to such prior occupant the reasonable value of such improvements to be determined under rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior. The decision of the Secretary in such cases is to be final and conclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 8, line 20, after the word "Interior", to strike out "may" and insert "shall", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior shall permit, under regulations to be prescribed by him, the free grazing within such districts of livestock kept for domestic purposes; and provided that so far as authorized by existing law or laws hereinafter enacted, nothing herein contained shall prevent the use of timber, stone, gravel, clay, coal, and other deposits by miners, prospectors for mineral, bona fide settlers and residents, for firewood, fencing, buildings, mining, prospecting, and domestic purposes within areas subject to the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 9, after the article "the", in line 5, to insert "acquisition"; in line 6, after the word "rights-of-way", to insert "within grazing districts"; in line 9, after the word "purposes", to strike out "nor" and insert "and"; in line 10, after the word "developing", to insert "mining"; and in line 11, after the article "the", to strike out "valuable", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. Nothing herein contained shall restrict the acquisition, granting, or use of permits or rights-of-way within grazing districts under existing law; or ingress or egress over the public lands in such districts for all proper and lawful purposes; and nothing herein contained shall restrict prospecting, locating, developing, mining, entering, leasing, or patenting the mineral resources of such districts under law applicable thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 9, line 25, after the word "thereof", to insert "Provided, That upon the application of any person qualified to make homestead entry under the public-land laws, filed in the land office of the proper district, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause any tract not exceeding 320 acres in any grazing district to be classified, and such application shall entitle the applicant to a preference right to enter such lands when opened to entry as herein provided:", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to examine and classify any lands within such grazing districts which are more valuable and suitable for the production of agricultural crops than native grasses and forage plants, and to open such lands to homestead entry in tracts not exceeding 320 acres in area. Such lands shall not be subject to settlement or occupation as homesteads until after same have been classified and opened to entry after notice to the permittee by the Secretary of the Interior, and the lands shall remain a part of the grazing district until patents are issued therefor, the homesteader to be, after his entry is allowed, entitled to the possession and use thereof: Provided, That upon the application of any person qualified to make homestead entry under the public-land laws, filed in the land office of the proper district, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause any tract not exceeding 320 acres in any grazing district to be classified, and such application shall entitle the applicant to a preference right to enter such lands when opened to entry as herein provided: Provided further, That no lands containing water holes, springs, or water supplies developed or improved by the holder of any grazing permit or his predecessor in interest shall be subject to classification, settlement, entry, or patent under the provisions of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 10, line 14, after the word "Secretary", to strike out "be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion" and insert "is authorized and directed"; in line 18, after the word "is", to strike out "hereby authorized, in his discretion" and insert "authorized and directed"; in line 20, after the word "any", to insert "privately owned"; in line 21, after the word "grazing", to strike out "district" and insert "district,"; in line 22, after the word "of", to insert "surveyed"; in line 24, after the word "State", to insert "or within a distance of not more than 50 miles within the adjoining State nearest the base lands"; on page 11, line 3, after the word "published", to insert "by the Secretary of the Interior"; and on page 12, line 4, after the word "thereon", to insert "Upon application of any State to exchange lands within or without the boundary of a grazing district the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed, pursuant to the provisions of this section as provided for privately owned lands, to proceed with such exchange at the earliest practicable date and to cooperate fully with the State to that end, but no State shall be permitted to select lieu lands in another State", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That where such action will promote the purposes of the district or facilitate its administration, the Secretary is authorized and directed to accept on behalf of the United States any lands within the exterior boundaries of a district as a gift, or, when public interests will be benefited thereby, he is authorized and directed to accept on behalf of the United States title to any privately owned lands within the exterior boundaries of said grazing district, and in exchange therefor to issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of surveyed grazing district land or of unreserved surveyed public land in the same State or within a distance of not more than 50 miles within the adjoining State nearest the base lands: Provided, That before any such exchange shall be effected, notice of the contemplated exchange, describing the lands involved, shall be published by the Secretary of the Interior once each week for 4 successive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which may be situated the lands to be accepted, and in the same manner in some like newspaper published in any county in which may be situated any lands to be given in such exchange; lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become public lands and parts of the grazing district within whose exterior boundaries they are located: Provided further, That either party to an exchange may make reservations of minerals, easements, or rights of use, the values of which shall be duly considered in determining the values of the exchanged lands. Where reservations are made in lands conveyed to the United States, the right to enjoy them shall be subject to such reasonable conditions respecting ingress and egress and the use of the surface of the land as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Interior. Where mineral reservations are made in lands conveyed by the United States, it shall be so stipulated in the patent, and any person who acquires the right to mine and remove the reserved mineral deposits may enter and occupy so much of the surface as may be required for all purposes incident to the mining and removal of the minerals therefrom, and may mine and remove such minerals, upon payment to the owner of the surface for damages caused to the land and improvements thereon. Upon application of any State to exchange lands within or without the boundary of a grazing district the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed, pursuant to the provisions of this section as provided for privately owned lands, to proceed with such exchange at the earliest practicable date and to cooperate fully with the State to that end, but no State shall be permitted to select lieu lands in another State.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is compelled to be absent, I wish to submit an amendment to the committee amendment, on page 12, to strike out all of lines 7 and 8 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Directed, in the manner provided for exchange of privately owned lands in this section, to proceed with such.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] on behalf of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 12, it is proposed to strike out all of lines 7 and 8 and in lieu thereof to insert:

Directed, in the manner provided for the exchange of privately owned lands in this section, to proceed with such.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was, in section 9, page 12, line 14, after the word "stockmen", to insert "State land officials, and official State agencies engaged in conservation or propagation of wild life"; in line 16, after the word "districts", to strike out "and with such advisory boards as they may name. The views of authorized advisory boards shall be given fullest consideration consistent with the proper use of the resource and the rights and needs of minorities"; in line 21, after the word "for", to insert "local hearings on"; in line 22 after the article "the", to strike out "decision" and insert "decisions"; in line 23, after the word "charge", to insert "in a manner similar to the procedure in the land department", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. The Secretary of the Interior shall provide, by suitable rules and regulations, for cooperation with local associations of stockmen, State land officials, and official State agencies engaged in conservation or propagation of wild life interested in the use of the grazing districts. The Secretary of the Interior shall provide by appropriate rules and regulations for local hearings on appeals from the decisions of the administrative officer in charge in a manner similar to the procedure in the land department. The Secretary of the Interior shall also be empowered to accept contributions toward the administration, protection, and improvement of the district, moneys so received to be covered into the Treasury as a special fund, which is hereby appropriated and made available until expended, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, for payment of expenses incident to said administration, protection, and improvement, and for refunds to depositors of amounts contributed by them in excess of their share of the cost.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 10, on page 13, line 14, after the word "available", to insert "when appropriated by the Congress"; in line 17, before the numerals "50", to strike out "an additional"; and on page 14, line 1, after the word "therein", to strike out "Provided further, That no moneys shall be used or made available for the purposes hereinbefore set forth until appropriated by Congress", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That, except as provided in sections 9 and 11 hereof, all moneys received under the authority of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts, but 25 percent of all moneys received from each grazing district during any fiscal year is hereby made available, when appropriated by the Congress, for expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior for the construction, purchase, or maintenance of range improvements, and 50 percent of the money received from each grazing district during any fiscal year shall be paid at the end thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State in which said grazing district is situated, to be expended as the State legislature may prescribe for the benefit of the county or counties in which the grazing district is situated: Provided, That if any grazing district is in more than one State or county, the distributive share to each from the proceeds of said district shall be proportional to its area therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 11, on page 14, line 20, to strike out "agreements, the", and insert "agreements. The"; and on page 15, line 3, after the word "public", to strike out "interest: Provided, That in such grazing districts established in Indian ceded lands, the Indians shall be classified as preferential applicants for grazing privileges, and surplus range may be allotted to the use of others only after the reasonable needs of the Indians for additional grazing lands have been met", and to insert the word "interest", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That when appropriated by Congress, 25 percent of all moneys received from each grazing district on Indian lands ceded to the United States for disposition under the public-land laws during any fiscal year is hereby made available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Interior for the construction, purchase, or maintenance of range improvements; and an additional 25 percent of the money received from grazing during each fiscal year shall be paid at the end thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State in which said lands are situated, to be expended as the State legislature may prescribe for the benefit of public schools and public roads of the county or counties in which such grazing lands are situated. And the remaining 50 percent of all money received from such grazing lands shall be deposited to the credit of the Indians pending final disposition under applicable laws, treaties, or agreements. The applicable public land laws as to said Indian ceded lands within a district created under this act shall continue in operation, except that each and every application for nonmineral title to said lands in a district created under this act shall be allowed only if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior the land is of the character suited to disposal through the act under which application is made and such entry and disposal will not affect adversely the best public interest, but no settlement or occupation of such lands shall be permitted until 90 days after allowance of an application.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 13, on page 15, line 17, after the words "United States", to strike out "upon the joint recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, be, and he is hereby", and to insert in lieu thereof the word "is"; in line 21, after the word "administration", to insert "in any State where national forests may be created or enlarged by Executive order"; and on page 16, line 13, after the word "act" and the period, to insert:

Nothing in this section shall be construed so as to limit the powers of the President (relating to reorganizations in the executive departments) granted by title IV of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1933.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. That the President of the United States is authorized to reserve by proclamation and place under national-forest administration in any State where national forests may be created or enlarged by Executive order any unappropriated public lands lying within watersheds forming a part of the national forests which, in his opinion, can best be administered in connection with existing national-forest administration units, and to place under the Interior Department administration any lands within national forests, principally valuable for grazing, which, in his opinion, can best be administered under the provisions of this act: Provided, That such reservations or transfers shall not interfere with legal rights acquired under any public-land laws so long as such rights are legally maintained. Lands placed under the national-forest administration under the authority of this act shall be subject to all the laws and regulations relating to national forests, and lands placed under the Interior Department administration shall be subject to all public-land laws and regulations applicable to grazing districts created under authority of this act. Nothing in this section shall be construed so as to limit the powers of the President (relating to reorganizations in the executive departments) granted by title 4 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes", approved March 3, 1933.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 20, to insert a new section 14.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, before the amendment is read, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 14, on page 16, line 22, after the numerals "2455", it is proposed to insert "notwithstanding the provisions of section 2357 of the Revised Statutes and of the act of August 30, 1890", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. That section 2455 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2455. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 2357 of the Revised Statutes and of the act of August 30, 1890, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to order into market and sell at public auction, at the land office of the district in which the land is situated, for not less than the appraised value, any isolated or disconnected tract or parcel of the public domain not exceeding 760 acres which, in his judgment, it would be proper to expose for sale after at least 30 days' notice by the land office of the district in which such land may be situated: Provided, That for a period of not less than 30 days after the highest bid has been received, any owner or owners of contiguous land shall have a preference right to buy the offered lands at such highest bid price, and where two or more persons apply to exercise such preference right the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make an equitable division of the land among such applicants, but in no case shall the adjacent land owner or owners be required to pay more than three times the appraised price: Provided, further, That any legal subdivisions of the public land, not exceeding 160 acres, the greater part of which is mountainous or too rough for cultivation, may, in the discretion of the said Secretary, be ordered into the market and sold pursuant to this section upon the application of any person who owns land or holds a valid entry of lands adjoining such tract, regardless of the fact that such tract may not be isolated or disconnected within the meaning of this section: Provided further, That this section shall not defeat any valid right which has already attached under any pending entry or location. The word 'person' in this section shall be deemed to include corporations, partnerships, and associations."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming explain the amendment?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, an amendment was inserted in the bill for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain isolated tracts which are not suitable for inclusion in grazing districts. It appears that the public-land laws now governing the sale of isolated tracts fix a minimum price of $1.25 an acre on some and $2.50 an acre on others. In view of the fact that the amendment changes the whole system by providing for appraisal, it was deemed advisable to do away with that limitation as to price and also with the limitation as to the amount of acreage a single purchaser may acquire. It is merely to clarify the amendment which has been approved by the committee and by the Department.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to know how that would affect State lands heretofore allocated pursuant to the agricultural college act and various other acts, where the restrictive acts were carried out at $1.25 per acre. Are we to understand now that a new policy is to go into effect even if the lands are still held by the State, although they were allocated for university and school purposes or may be under contract by the State?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. This would not affect them at all.

Mr. McCARRAN. Why not?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. This affects only lands which are under control of the Federal Government, which are embraced within the unreserved and unappropriated public domain, and upon which no contractual rights or any other private or State rights have been initiated.

Mr. McCARRAN. How would it affect sections 13 and 36 of each township?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It would not affect them at all.

Mr. McCARRAN. Why not?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Because it does not apply to them.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is not allocated land. It is simply land that may be allocated or may be selected for school purposes, or it may not. The State may select it or it may abrogate its right to select it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The purpose of the section is to provide for the sale of isolated tracts which are too small to be available for the creation of grazing districts. They are detached from the body of the public domain. They are not now likely to be entered because the land is not sufficiently good to invite any entrymen to go to the trouble of even making application to enter it, to say nothing about living upon it. The purpose of the amendment is to establish a system whereby such lands may be sold to others, homesteaders or ranchers, who may make good use of them. It applies only to an inconsiderable portion of the public domain and could not possibly affect any State interest except to the extent that it places additional land on the tax roll.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think I understand what the Senator has in mind. I am wondering if that means that where a homestead may have been taken up within an area which may be designated for a particular grazing district under the terms of the bill, the homestead entry may be canceled and the homesteader removed therefrom?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no. No such authority is granted.

Mr. McCARRAN. Where is the guarantee against it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. His rights are specifically guaranteed in the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly direct my attention to the particular language?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. At the bottom of page 2, this language was inserted by the committee:

Nothing in this act shall be construed in any way to diminish, restrict, or impair any right which has been heretofore or may be hereafter initiated under existing law, and which is maintained pursuant to law except as otherwise expresly provided in this act, nor to affect any land heretofore or hereafter surveyed which, except for the provisions of this act, would be a part of any grant to any State.

No homestead may be cut off. No State may be denied any unsurveyed lands and any individual who desires to make an entry even in a grazing district may demand a classification of the lands.

We have left nothing undone to protect individual rights and State rights.

Mr. McCARRAN. Suppose, as a matter of instance, a district is about to be created according to the terms of the bill, and somewhere in the midst of that proposed district there is a homestead, perhaps not yet perfected, but in existence. The homesteader believes that he has certain rights on the public domain.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. He is entitled to those rights. He may maintain those rights. His homestead cannot be affected or taken away from him, but if he wants to do so he may exchange it for other land outside the district.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly tell me what his rights would be under the bill if enacted into law?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. His right to his homestead would be just as it is now.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he should not have read the language on page 3, lines 5 to 7?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; I think that would have added strength to it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The language there is definitely responsive to the question of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; it reads as follows:

Nor as limiting or restricting the power or authority of any State as to matters within its jurisdiction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was, on page 18, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 15. The Secretary of the Interior is further authorized in his discretion, where vacant, unappropriated, and unreserved lands of the public domain are situated in such isolated or disconnected tracts of more than 760 acres as not to justify their inclusion in any grazing district to be established pursuant to this act, to lease any such lands to owners of lands contiguous thereto for grazing purposes, upon application therefor by any such owner, and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, lines 6 and 7, it is proposed to strike out "more than 760 acres" and to insert in lieu thereof "640 acres or more."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 6, line 19, after the word "inclusive", to insert:

and provide that any holder of a lien on the livestock of any qualified permittee shall be subrogated to all rights of such permittee under this act upon default under such lien, and all rights of such permittee under this act shall continue and be recognized in the holder of such lien so long as said permittee may be an obligor of or to any such loaning agency, governmental or private.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask the Senator having charge of the bill to accept the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to have the purpose and effect of the amendment explained. May I ask the Senator from Nevada whether that is one of the amendments that were submitted to the committee?

Mr. McCARRAN. In a different form. In other words, it has been submitted back to the Department; and the Department, through its representative who is now here on the floor sitting next to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], has accepted this amendment.

If I may explain in a very brief statement the object of the amendment, in the West there are some 160,000,000 acres of unappropriated public domain. I may say, without any desire to emphasize it, that of the one hundred and sixty-odd million acres of unappropriated public domain, 56,000,000 acres are in my own State; I think perchance a little more than 56,000,000 acres.

Wherever there may be water throughout the West, there the settler has made his homestead. Whether the water came from a spring or from a running stream, or whether he developed it out of the earth by wells tapping subterranean flow, wherever he has made a homestead he has created something that is green; he has made two blades of grass grow where no blades of grass grew formerly.

With that development there came the development of stockraising. Cattle and sheep are essential to agricultural pursuits. They are essential now to western agricultural pursuits. They will be as long as the mind of man may reach into the future. The homesteader, the man who took up the desert of the West and reclaimed it, became accustomed by reason of tradition, rules and regulations never written in statutes but recognized by mankind generally, to the use of the public domain. What controls the public domain in the arid West? Those who listen to me today know what controls the public domain in the arid West. It is a spring here, and a seepage of water there, and a little stream somewhere else.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield, gladly.

Mr. HATCH. In line with the Senator's thought, I desire to direct his attention to an amendment which I shall offer as soon as his amendment shall have been acted upon.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well; I thank the Senator from New Mexico. So that those springs, those seepages, and those little trickles of water, have become the thing that has dominated and made possible the development of the great arid West.

There is not any question about that. Those of us who live out there know it. A man has 40 acres here, and a spring upon it. It is 25 miles remote from his home ranch. Let me make the picture.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I did not care to interrupt the thread of the Senator's argument, but I have just read his amendment, and I desire to ask him a question with respect to it.

The amendment reads:

And provided that any owner of a lien on the livestock of any qualified permittee shall be subrogated to all rights of such permittee under this act upon default under such lien—

To that point I quite agree with what the Senator is seeking to do; but I read the remainder of his amendment—and all rights of such permittee under this act shall continue and be recognized in the holder of such lien so long as said permittee may be an obligor of or to any such loaning agency, governmental or private.

Is not the Senator fearful that that language would place the permittee under an unduly stringent degree of control by the person who had happened to loan him money?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is not the object.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I know it is not the object.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the language conveys that idea, I am only too glad to submit to any amendment that will get away from that.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, may I interrupt to suggest another point? If I read the suggested amendment correctly, if one of the loaning agencies referred to has a lien upon a single animal belonging to a permittee, he is thereby subrogated to all the rights of the permittee, regardless of how wide they may be; and, further than that, so long as that lien continues, the permit must continue, regardless of the provisions of the permit. In other words, it may continue indefinitely.

Mr. McCARRAN. I hope I did not hear the Senator incorrectly. As I caught his statement, if a loaning agency had a lien on any animals, regardless of how wide the rights might be, the rights of the agency would be subrogated. Some of them are not so wide out west right now, because of the drought. [Laughter.] I know what the Senator means, however, and I am only facetious to a certain point.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator is justified.

Mr. McCARRAN. What I have in mind, however, is that one holding a farm or a homestead who has heretofore depended upon the public range as a part of an integral unit, of which his homestead may have been the minor part, shall have the privilege of going to a loaning agency and asking permission to borrow, and having recognition of the fact that he has certain rights upon the public domain which shall not be interfered with during the term of that loan. Do I make myself clear to the learned Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; except to this extent, if I may point out again, trying to be more accurate: If the loaning agency has a loan upon 10 head of the permittee's stock, and the permittee has the right to graze a thousand head, the man with the loan upon 10 head is subrogated to the right of the permittee to graze a thousand head upon the range.

Mr. McCARRAN. All right, why not? It became a part of the security. It was a part of the security when the money was loaned.

Mr. ADAMS. I can understand that the money loaner would be very much delighted with it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; more than that, the farmer would be delighted with it. If the farmers in Colorado today could get the benefit of the amendment I am offering, they would not be writing in here asking for this amendment to be offered; and they have been writing to the learned Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention to the language on page 6, line 9, which reads as follows:

Preference shall be given in the issuance of grazing permits to those within or near a district who are landowners engaged in the livestock business, bona fide occupants or settlers, or owners of water or water rights, as may be necessary to permit the proper use of lands—

And so forth. The preferential right to these leases goes with the land; and certainly if the land passed, or the other property passed, it would pass with the land.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator is now speaking of leases. I am not speaking of leases at all. I am speaking of the right of user.

Mr. CAREY. That is what I am referring to, the right of using the range. Does the Senator mean the present users, or the people who are to have the preference under this bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not consider that there will be any preference under this bill. Those who have used in the past should be preferred under this bill.

Mr. CAREY. I think this provision gives preference to the people who have adjacent land and who live nearby. If a man had given a mortgage on his livestock, that preference would go with his property, and I think anybody lending money to him would be protected under the bill as it is.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well. Then let us assume that a loan is made to a man who has 100 acres of land in fee simple, and he has 200 head of cattle, which have been accustomed to range on the open public domain. He asks for a loan from some Federal agency. They say to him, "Yes; we will loan to you as much as is the value of your fee-simple land." He says, "But I have a right on the open public domain." They say, "You have no right. That belongs to the Government of the United States, and may be taken from you tomorrow, or at any other time."

Mr. CAREY. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in making loans at the present time consideration is taken of the rights which people have on the forests, and that principle would apply to these lands as well as it would apply to the forests. That right is recognized by the Government and other agencies in making loans.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am informed, Mr. President, that the Forest Service have recently ruled in certain zones that loans are made pursuant to forest rights; but the same question has arisen with reference to forest rights that has arisen and will arise with reference to rights on the open public domain. They say, "You have a right today, but the Forest Service may cut you off tomorrow."

I have met that situation day after day, time after time. If the loans are now being made on the basis of forest rights, then that is something new, and I am glad to hear it.

Mr. CAREY. They are making permittees assign their permits when loans are made.

Mr. McCARRAN. That may be true; that is exactly what I want to apply to the open public domain which is not within the forest. The Senator and I understand that all western lands are not forest lands. Hence this bill is going to take into consideration the nonforest lands, and I think the same rule which the learned Senator from Wyoming tells me has now been applied to rights within the forests should apply to rights within the open public domain. That is the object and purpose of the amendment.

Mr. President, if the amendment, drafted under the guidance and with the full knowledge of the Department, is not to be accepted, then I am not going to yield to anything. If this amendment is not to be accepted, after its language has been submitted to the Department, and after the Department has assented to that language, notwithstanding the fact that I submitted it to the whole committee, then I am sorry for this bill. I say so now, and I am not taking advantage of anybody.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I trust the Senator does not propose to oppose a bill in its entirety because some Member of the Senate might see fit to oppose an amendment which he offers. Surely, I have to say to the Senator that he will have to exercise his own rights and privileges, because I will not accept what I regard as an improper amendment under threats of that kind.

Mr. McCARRAN. I was not speaking to the Senator from Colorado. I did not know the Senator from Colorado had charge of the bill. If I had known that, I would have addressed myself to him a long time ago, and I apologize to him if I am in error.

Mr. ADAMS. No apology is needed.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the Senator from Colorado is in charge of the bill on the floor, I should like to be advised, so that I may guide myself accordingly.

Mr. ADAMS. I am.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada seems to be an amendment to a committee amendment which has already been adopted. In order that it may be in order, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will have to be reconsidered.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not understand my amendment to be an amendment to a committee amendment. Am I in error in that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator's amendment is on page 6, line 19, immediately following the period, which would make it an amendment to a committee amendment.

Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I was about to make a suggestion, that that objection could be very readily obviated by merely changing the point of application of the amendment, which is now offered to be inserted in the middle of the committee amendment. If it were dropped down to the end of the next sentence, it would not come within the rule. I merely suggest that. It would fit in as well below.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Nevada that the only discussion which I have heard with respect to his amendment has been designed to accomplish the same object he has in mind. There is no disposition, so far as I have been able to determine, to oppose the amendment as an amendment.

If I understand the Senator correctly, his purpose is merely to guarantee that the rights to grazing privileges which are conveyed by the bill shall be so definite and so certain that they may be recognized as security when the holder seeks a loan.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As I read the language, it goes much further than that, and it would subject the permittee to control and domination by the money lender, which I am sure the Senator from Nevada does not desire to put into effect.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not, and if there is any clarifying language which could be employed, I will accept it in just a moment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will be very glad to work it out with the Senator. For my part, I should say that ever since I saw the amendment, about an hour ago, I have been turning over in my own mind the problem, in the hope that I might be able to find a solution, but I confess to the Senator that I cannot now think of language by which we could make it mandatory upon any person lending money to accept any particular kind of security.

Mr. McCARRAN. I respectfully suggest to the learned Senator from Wyoming that it is not a question of requiring any mortgagee or loan agent to accept security. It is a question of crystallizing the security which the mortgagee or loan agent may and will accept, so that no intervening agency, governmental, or otherwise, may take from the value of the security. I hope I make myself clear.

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. Is the amendment of the Senator from Nevada an amendment to a committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment to the committee amendment on page 6.

Mr. FESS. Which has already been acted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment has been adopted, and the Chair has inquired whether there is objection to reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. I just wanted to ascertain the parliamentary status, so that if that were the status, I could ask for a reconsideration of the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment on page 6 was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Navada to the committee amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the biggest thing there is in the West is that which is now under consideration.

We are just about ready to give up control of a majority of the public lands and the surface of some States. Fifty-six million acres out of seventy-odd million acres in one sovereign State will pass out of control of that sovereign State and pass into the control of the Federal Government. I do not know how many acres now a part of the States represented by the learned Senators will pass into the control of the Federal Government, but, regardless of the amount, whether it be a minimum or a maximum of acreage, the Federal Government is about to step in and take control.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Partly in response to the inquiry or perhaps the challenge made a moment ago, it occurs to me that the Senator is slightly in error when he says that this bill will transfer to the control of the Federal Government property now controlled by the States. This bill does not change the title; it does not change the control of an acre of ground. It merely seeks to exercise power which is now in the Federal Government, and to exercise it for the benefit of the citizens of the States.

This suggests an inquiry that I should like to make of the Senator from Nevada. My inquiry is this: Is it the Senator's desire to make provision so that the lender of money may secure for additional security upon his loan the right which the permittee secures in the grazing district? If so, why not put in a provision that whatever rights he has may be assignable as security for the indebtedness?

Mr. McCARRAN. I respectfully answer the learned Senator from Colorado that under this bill he will have no rights. His rights have been written away from him.

Mr. ADAMS. The permittee secures a permit. That is what the Senator is dealing with in his amendment. The Senator is providing that in the case of the permittee who borrows money the lender shall be subrogated to his rights in the permit. The Senator is dealing with the permit. The permit has a definite period of time to run. All that he can give is that which he has. Why not say plainly in the amendment that he shall have the right to execute an assignment or some instrument of incumbrance upon his permit?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly what the amendment prescribes.

Mr. ADAMS. If that was what the amendment provided, there would be no objection to it. The amendment provides more than that.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then there should be no objection to it.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator has not, I am afraid, read his own amendment with care, because it provides in substance that the permit shall be extended indefinitely beyond the period prescribed, unless the indebtedness is paid. The man who has a 5-year permit, by delaying the payment of his indebtedness, may secure an indefinite permit. That would violate the very purpose of having a regulation.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator is simply throwing up a smoke screen now.

Mr. ADAMS. No; I am reading the Senator's amendment, which provides:

> And all rights of such permittee under this act shall continue and be recognized in the holder of such lien so long as such permittee may be an obligor of or to any such loan agency, governmental or private.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct. A farmer asks for a thousand-dollar or a five-thousand-dollar loan, and he says, "Here is all I have under fee simple, but here are my rights on the open public domain." He goes to a private loaning agency, he goes to a State bank, or he goes to a Federal loaning agency, and gets the money. Why should that security, which was security when he acquired the loan, be destroyed until the loan is paid? Will the Senator kindly answer that question?

Mr. ADAMS. I cannot answer it, because I cannot understand it. As a matter of fact, there is nothing in the act which destroys the permit which the man had when he made the loan. It continues it. The only thing I can suggest is, if the Senator wants a provision that may be assignable, that may be subject to a mortgage, why not draw an amendment which would make it plain?

Mr. McCARRAN. If the learned Senator from Colorado has read the bill—and I take it he has, because he has given it much study and time—he knows that this matter——

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, we cannot hear the Senators on this side of the Chamber. This is a part of the West.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am glad to take the Senator from Michigan into our fraternity. He knows that this whole matter is one of administration, one of rule and regulation; that the Interior Department will write rules and regulations under this bill, and those rules and regulations will become the law of the West from now on.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I may say that whatever the Senator from Nevada may believe, my desire at least is to cooperate with him in securing the object which he has stated and which I attempted to restate, and which he said I correctly restated.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very glad to have the Senator's cooperation. I had hoped to have it when I presented this amendment to the committee, but evidently it did not then appeal to the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The amendment was not presented in this form to the committee, to my knowledge.

Mr. McCARRAN. The substance of it was.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Now we are discussing a matter of language, and I would desire to call the Senator's attention again to the language: "and all rights of such permittee under this act shall continue and be recognized in the holder"—how long? "so long as said permittee may be an obligor." What does that mean? Calling the Senator's attention to the language of the bill on page 6, I shall ask his opinion presently. This is the language: "Such permits shall be for a period of not more than 10 years."

Mr. McCARRAN. That is exactly what I want the Senator to dwell on. In other words, the right exists for 10 years, and to get that right extended it will be necessary to go to the Secretary of the Interior, but the loan from a Federal agency may extend over 30 years. How will one get a loan from a Federal agency where there is a spread of 30 years, when one has only 10 years of a right or permit by authority of the Department of the Interior under the provisions of this bill? That is exactly what I wanted brought out, and I am delighted that the Senator from Wyoming brought it out.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am delighted also, because we are trying to develop this bill. May I call the Senator's attention now to the fact that his amendment provides that these rights shall continue so long as the permittee may be an obligor; not only of a Government loaning agency, but of any private loaning agency? Would it not be possible under that language, which provides that the rights of the permittee shall continue so long as he is an obligor of a private agency, for a permittee who desires to extend his permit to the exclusion of the rights of homesteaders, of occupants, and settlers who are coming in on the public domain, to enter into an arrangement with some individual merely for the purpose of setting up an obligation so that it would be impossible to terminate the permit, so that permittee A with an associate, B, who was loaning money, could enter into a conspiracy to defeat the purposes of the act, and to prevent a homesteader or an occupant or a settler from acquiring rights upon the grazing district? May I ask the Senator, Would that not be possible under his amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. I answer the learned Senator from Wyoming thus, that the ingenuity of man has never yet been able to legislate against connivance or scheming, but the ingenuity of man must at all times be bent along lines of broad, open development. I say, yes; there might be a chance for such as that; but it is a fraudulent thing. However, I cannot, neither can the Senator, legislate against prospective fraud.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Then, why cannot we attempt to work out language here which will be acceptable to the committee and which will secure the thing sought for?

Mr. McCARRAN. I have tried it for a month, and I was turned down cold in the committee. They said they were going to put this bill through, and I say they are not going to put it through until there are amendments to this bill which will protect the rights of the man who has settled on the plains and made a livelihood and a homestead out of the lands where other men would not even dare venture.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly; I yield for a question.

Mr. ADAMS. No; I think for a correction. The Senator is in error when he says he was turned down cold by the committee.

Mr. McCARRAN. I took the Senator's own statement.

Mr. ADAMS. Careful consideration was given to the Senator's amendments. The Senator appeared and presented them. They were considered afterward, and no one on the committee has ever said that the bill was going to pass, or made any declaration on the subject. The bill is submitted upon its merits. We believe it should pass. Those two statements by the Senator, however, are erroneous.

Mr. McCARRAN. They are not erroneous; and I will take the Senator's own statement, made to me, in which the Senator said that my amendments had been rejected.

Mr. ADAMS. They were, but not without consideration.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not know anything about the consideration, but I do know about the rejection. That they are before the Senate now, I do know also. If there is merit in this bill, we may have that merit. I am for merit, but I do not propose to legislate the trail-blazers of the West out of existence, and I am not going to stand for it so long as I have vitality sufficient to resist it.

This is a minor matter, and I am wondering what is behind the opposition to the amendment. It is a minor matter that we have been working on for months and months and months, asking the Federal agency if they will not recognize the rights of western farmers. They say, "No; unless you have a fence around your land, unless you own it in fee simple, unless it is something that we can ride over and understand, you cannot borrow a dollar on it."

Foreclosure after foreclosure is pending today in the West, not in my State alone, but in the State of the learned Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] and the State of the learned Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and other Western States. One foreclosure brings on another; every time a foreclosure is brought about there is created one more incident to destroy confidence in the American Government. What I am anxious for is to build up something with a permanency that will have the public domain as a background and the public domain will mean something to those who live on it.

Mr. President, it is quite apparent that the learned Senator in charge of this bill does not intend to accept this amendment. I have appealed to him, but it is apparent that he does not propose to yield. Therefore, we must take such course as will guarantee the enactment of proper legislation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] has indicated that it is his desire to present an amendment to the bill. May I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that if he will allow his amendment to be temporarily laid aside while the Senator from New Mexico presents his amendment, I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to cooperate with the Senator, and I am sure that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], who is in charge of the bill, will also be glad to do so in the effort to reach an effective solution of the problem which the Senator presents.

Mr. McCARRAN. What is the subject matter of the amendment proposed by the learned Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HATCH. The amendment, Mr. President, which I desire to present——

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to have it understood that I am not yielding the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the amendment which I desire to present is to section 7, on page 10, beginning in line 7, to strike out the proviso. Has the Senator a copy of the bill before him?

Mr. McCARRAN. I have not before me a copy of the bill, but I shall obtain one.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Nevada consents that his amendment may be laid aside temporarily so that I may offer the amendment to which I have referred.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do so with the understanding that I shall not by yielding temporarily lose the floor. I am not especially familiar with the rules of the Senate, and I do not desire to yield if by so doing I lose the floor. Otherwise, I shall gladly yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the Senator from Nevada may retain the floor.

Mr. DILL. The Senator from Nevada can again obtain the floor by offering his amendment. There will be no trouble about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With that understanding, the Chair recognizes the Senator from New Mexico.

The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in line 7, I move to strike out the colon after the word "provided", and to insert a period and then to strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator from New Mexico again indicate the location of his amendment.

Mr. HATCH. My amendment comes in on page 10, line 7. The Senator from Colorado is familiar with the proposal. By way of brief explanation of the amendment I will say that it was offered to the committee by the Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], but the committee rejected the amendment. Section 7, Mr. President, provides generally that lands which are chiefly valuable for agriculture may be so classified by the Secretary and may be thrown open to entry and settlement under the homestead laws. Those are the general provisions of that section, and under these provisions it is stated that lands which are chiefly valuable for agriculture may yet be subject to homestead entry. The section of the bill which provides that lands in a grazing district on the public domain shall automatically be withdrawn from settlement will not apply, but the Secretary of the Interior will have the right and the authority to classify the lands chiefly valuable for agriculture and permit their entry and settlement as such.

The proviso which my amendment seeks to strike out reads as follows:

> Provided further, That no lands containing water holes, springs, or water supplies developed or improved by the holder of any grazing permit or his predecessor in interest shall be subject to classification, settlement, entry, or patent under the provisions of this section.

That proviso, in my opinion, Mr. President, entirely nullifies all the preceding language of the section. It does effectually withdraw all the public domain from homestead entry, for, with that proviso in the bill, lands where there are waters of any kind, whether streams, springs, or what not, which have even been improved by the holder of the permit may never become subject to entry and settlement under the homestead laws.

I do not object to all possible protection being given to the public domain and to the grazing districts and to the cattlemen and sheepmen; in fact, I strongly favor those industries; but, nevertheless, there are in my State some sections which may be chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes and which should be open to settlement and homestead entry. Under this proviso, however, they can never be classified as valuable for agricultural purposes and therefore may never be open to settlement. Under the terms of this section generally the Secretary of the Interior has full power to protect the cattle and sheep industries and the grazing rights, because if the lands are not chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes he does not have to classify them as such. I am willing that that power shall remain in the Secretary under the bill as drawn, but I want the Secretary to have the power, Mr. President, when lands are chiefly valuable for agriculture to classify them as such, so that they may be homesteaded and patented as the public domain has been throughout the years.

As I have stated, the committee rejected the amendment. I shall not press the amendment further. I felt that the Senate should know what the provisions of this section were and that, with the proviso in the bill as it is now drawn, no lands can be ever homesteaded in the West, for if there is no water, a homestead entry will be of no avail and to no purpose.

TUGWELL-ROOSEVELT "COLLECTIVISM" VERSUS THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, have we come to the parting of the ways? Shall we abide by the Constitution and the principles which have brought us world leadership, or shall we embrace that scheme of Federal control, midway between socialism and communism, which the doctors call "collectivism"?

Mark Sullivan, in the New York Herald Tribune of June 6 sees in the confirmation of the appointee, Professor Tugwell, the "collectivist" and "new dealer no. 1", to a high Government office, as a "milestone" in the possible trend of America from historic principles. Said he:

> There can be no doubt that approval of Professor Tugwell by one of America's two great political parties will be a historic departure.

"Professor Tugwell's philosophy", says Sullivan, "is 'collectivism'." What "collectivism" means we may gather from the five-page sample of Tugwell's thesis published in the RECORD of June 8. It appears to mean a Federal "consultative body" endowed with power to regiment national industry, commerce, and consumption. For the existing order, Tugwell sees this picture:

> There may be a long and lingering death, but it must be regarded as inevitable.

He would set up in Washington a "consultative body" and a "planning body." This sounds not unlike Moscow. Tugwell would also reduce this national system to a "plan", possibly something on the pattern of the "5-year plan" of Soviet Russia, of which he speaks approvingly.

Nor would he lose much time about it. Says Tugwell:

> It seems altogether likely that we shall set up, and soon, such a consultative body.

In a footnote concerning the nature of the "consultative body", Tugwell quotes an authority:

> Mr. L. L. Lorwin distinguishes four possible types of these bodies, which he calls: (1) The absolute socialist type, (2) the partial State-socialist type, (3) the voluntary-business type, and (4) the social-progressive type.

Apparently, the A.A.A. and the N.R.A. are the temporary forms of what Tugwell aims to solidify into his permanent "plan" which relegates our present American civilization to a "long and lingering death."

The transition from the A.A.A. and N.R.A. to Tugwell's permanent plan seems to be indicated in the following sentence:

> The setting up of even an emasculated and ineffective central coordinating body in Washington will form a focus about which recognition may gradually gather.

Tugwell's phrase, "emasculated and ineffective", is prophetic as applied to the A.A.A. and N.R.A. administrations. Doubtless he aspires to the high office of Undersecretary so that he may hold together what General "Crackdown" Johnson seems bent on rending asunder.

The job before Tugwell, he admits, is no playboy's job, "for", says he, "we have a century and more of development to undo."

Evidently, therefore, Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell is going to undo everything America has done as far back as President Andrew Jackson if not as far as Washington and Jefferson. He and General Johnson will take the place in American history once held by Jefferson and General Washington—at least in the hearts of the Senate majority who are about to crown the professor with an olive wreath, unless, of course, the patriotic, courageous Senators from South Carolina and Virginia substitute something else.

The method by which Dr. Tugwell would bring about the "long and lingering death" of the present order and substitute his "collectivist" social order is highly enlightening. He says:

> The first series of changes will have to do with statutes, with constitutions, and with government.

It is now understandable why Dr. Tugwell is known as "New Dealer No. 1." Here we seem to have the prophetic forecast of what has happened to us during the past year—the 57 alphabetical varieties of new bureaus and administrations, the suspension of the Constitution in order to pass two dozen acts transferring the powers of Congress to the White House, the suspension of the antitrust laws and civil service act, the creation of thousands of high-salaried offices outside of civil service and without approval of the Senate, and, finally, the demand of the President that his "emergency" powers be made permanent. All this is coming to pass in accord with the epistle of Tugwell.

The next step in the evolution of the Tugwellian Democracy that is to take the place of Jeffersonian Democracy is pictured by Tugwell thus:

> It will require the laying of rough, unholy hands on many a sacred precedent, doubtless calling on an enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement.

The recent demand for an increased standing Army, the possible mobilization of the C.C.C. camps, the expansion of the Navy and air fleet, the seven new Federal criminal acts, and the assumption of dictatorial powers appear to dovetail with the gospel according to Tugwell. The prophet deserves his crown.

Tugwell's "enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement" of his national planning aims to reduce, it is evident, the 48 States, the 3,000 counties, and the 130,000,000 population into obedient Federalist control—something after the plan of the districts and provinces under the central executive committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The people of the States are to be made to forget State sovereignty and accept the Federal dictatorship.

Undoubtedly he correctly says:

> There is no denying that the contemporary situation in the United States has explosive possibilities.

Even the suggestion of Tugwell has produced frequent outbreaks in this Senate Chamber, including the "blow up" of the patient country-loving Chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Professor Tugwell is not oblivious of such outbreaks. Indeed, he seems to welcome them, for he says:

> Perhaps our statesmen will give way or be more or less gently removed from office; perhaps our constitutions and statutes will be revised * * *.

The vote which we take here within the next 48 hours may determine what "statesmen will give way" to Dr. Tugwell and his foreign doctrines and what statesmen prefer to defy the Tugwellian group to "more or less gently" remove them from the Senate Chamber and overthrow the Constitution.

Among the statesmen particularly concerned are, not only the 96 Senators of the 48 States and the 435 Members of the House, but the governors and attorney generals of the 48 States, together with the sheriffs and county boards of the 3,000 counties. It may indeed require "an enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement" of the Tugwell regime. The proposed expansion of the standing Army, even with the aid of the enlarged air force, may not be enough. The million in the C.C.C. forest reserves may not be enough, even if the boys were disposed to fight their own kith and kin to serve a "collectivist" new deal from Wall Street.

It is doubtful if the $10,000,000,000 of one or another kind of doles distributed during the past 15 months will buy enough fighting men to Russianize or Romanize the United States. The largesses distributed to banks, railways, utilities, and the high salaries of 57 kinds of Federal bureaus and administrations may vastly increase the number of generals and colonels, but may not stimulate the right kind of fighting men.

Brigadier General Johnson was not known to the country when he put over the draft in 1917. The country knows him now. In the steel strike now threatening, neither the workers nor the employers seem to be willing to have anything to do with Johnson. Nor does "Crackdown" Johnson appeal to the 10,000,000 farmers, nor to the townspeople, the small business shops, nor to the 130,000,000 consumers.

Nor is that all of the difficulty of an appeal to force. The women of the 40,000,000 homes will not rise to support "an enlarged and nationalized police power" that may mean civil war—a war of the centralized "collectivists" upon the commonwealths and homesteads.

What about the veterans of the World War and the sons of the veterans of other wars? Has there been anything in the attitude of this administration, anything in the attiture of the followers of the new deal to evoke patriotic support? Will the strong-arm tactics exhibited by the majority whip in this Chamber on measures for veteran relief inspire the veteran 4,000,000 to support a Federal police power and national force act?

Take the so-called "Economy Act" with its 25 percent cut in the relief pension of war-disabled veterans. Take the messages of the White House with relation to veteran relief. Take the President's speeches to veteran gatherings. Take the vote of the House and Senate in overriding the veto of the veteran act. Take the attitude of the veterans, their families and friends, in 48 States of this Union. These memories are too fresh in the minds of the country to warrant any possibility of a present or near-future veteran support for an imperialistic regime with an "enlarged and nationalized police power." Even starvation would not inspire the popular accord of a Nazist or Fascist movement. American youth cannot be brought to fight soon for any "collectivist" cult against the old homes and firesides.

This Tugwell idea of an "enlarged and nationalized police power" serves simply to produce one conviction, and that is, that he is unfit to hold a responsible public office, either as Under Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, or in any other position where he may foment domestic strife, poison the American mind with Old World false doctrine, and undermine the Constitution and the cause of American liberty.

Moreover, I see no good reason why there should be any such office as Under Secretary of the Department of Agriculture. The rider creating that superfluous office specially for him by will of the President, during a time when the Treasury is bankrupt with a deficit of four billions, appears, from the discussion in this Chamber, to have been sneaked through without the knowledge of the Senate Agricultural and Forestry Committee, which had charge of the bill. It seems that only one member of a large committee knew of the rider and its passage. That office was created by misunderstanding of the Senators handling it, and without the knowledge of the Senators most concerned—without debate and by subterfuge. That office is a fraud on the farmers of the United States, unasked for by agriculture, unasked for by any State in the Union or by any of the 300 farm organizations—a snake in the grass, a shame on Senate legislation, a treasonable rattlesnake that should be scotched by the Senate before it poisons the body politic.

The Senate committees having to do with this uncalled-for sinecure should take the necessary measures to rescind the vote creating the office or repeal that section of the bill.

That may be the best way of meeting this "collectivist" cult and delaying national recovery by the prospect of a fight on the Constitution and American institutions. That seems to be the speediest method of killing this proposal to lay "rough, unholy hands on sacred precedents", as threatened by Tugwell, and also put a quietus on his threat of "an enlarged and nationalized police power", which readily may precipitate the so-called "revolution", prospects of which his group seems to welcome.

We do not want Tugwell's "rationale", nor its "internationale." We are Americans and hold to that document which begins, "We the people of the United States." We do not wish any importations from an Old World which our fathers fled to set up a free government of their own. We are not going back to any raw deal, any slick deal, any old deal called "new deal", or Tugwell's "rationale." Let us abolish both the office and its emissary.

Let those who cast their lots with Tugwell and thereby make an "historic departure" from all we call American take the consequences of their action. Are you for the Constitution or the Tugwell "rationale"? Are you for the States or for the Tugwell-Moley "collectivism" and a "nationalized police power" to uphold a Russianized or Romanized dictatorship? Are your colors the Blue Eagle or the old Stars and Stripes? Are you for the N.R.A. or for the old U.S.A.?

Tugwell cites as his authorities for his "collectivist" cult about 40 authorities—substantially all foreign, such as Karl Marx, Hinrichs, Slichter, and the Soviets.

The "Gosplan" of which he speaks with such approval is that of the "State planning commission" of the Russian Soviets, the U.S.S.R.

Does the United States Senate propose to elevate Rexford Guy Tugwell to a post whereby he can impose the Russian "Gosplan" on the farmers of the United States?

Will Durant, in the Saturday Evening Post of June 9, reviews a recent German work by Spengler, who defines Communism as an "authoritative bureaucracy." How does that differ from the Tugwell plan, with its "central group" in Washington, and its "enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement"?

Durant finally arrives at the following sound and rational view:

> We have listened to these alien mentors long enough; we have heard patiently the Fascists and the Communists, the Hitlers and the Stalins, the Spenglers and the Shaws; we perceive that they are all one—the dead fruit of a dying continent. Now let us renew ourselves at our own sources, drink again of Washington and Jefferson, of Franklin and Irving, of Lincoln and Whitman, of Emerson and Mark Twain. Our maturity cannot lie in the perfecting of another culture; it must grow from the development of our own, from the fulfillment of our own possibilities in our own way. There is only one thing that America needs today—though she needs it vitally—and that is to be completely herself.

Mr. President, the first step of the Senate in the direction of being completely itself is to recover the functions of the Senate that we have been weak enough to surrender to the White House. The next step is to put an end to the "emergency" powers of a dictatorship and thereby end the alleged "emergency." The obvious and ready-at-hand measure in that direction is to rescind the vote and repeal the rider which threatens the country with new mischief, and thereby scotch the Tugwell snake in its hole.

Thomas Jefferson looked upon free speech and a free press as so vital to the existence of a republic that he included them in article I of our American Bill of Rights.

Rexford Guy Tugwell recognizes free speech and a free press as evident sources of danger to his "national planning" control enforced by "an enlarged and nationalized police power." He has a phrase in his thesis which reads "unlikely to be allowed freedom of speech." Also, there is to be no venture of private enterprise, and no exemption from "compulsory social control." This implies no freedom of the press. The press is to come under "compulsory control" as under Nazist rule, Mussolini, and the Soviet.

Among the institutions to which Tugwell delegates a "long and lingering death" he doubtless looks upon article I of the American Bill of Rights as one of the first to take the beheading block after a long strangling process by the N.R.A. press code, the Rayburn communications-control bill, and a general press and telegraphic censorship.

Secretary Wallace, to whom Tugwell is to be Under Secretary unless the Senate prevents, says "America must choose." This means that the Senate must choose. Shall we choose free speech and a free press under the American Bill of Rights, or shall we take the controlled press of a Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, or Tugwell?

The Senate is about to make its choice. If we want American institutions to endure, we shall meet the issue now by voting out this new post of "collectivism" and its beneficiary and uphold the Constitution to which we have given our oaths of allegiance.

THE ALIBI OF TUGWELL

Mr. President, the alibi of Rexford Guy Tugwell, who seeks promotion to a $10,000 salary as Under Secretary of the Secretary of Agriculture, appears divisible, when cross-examined on what he meant by his thesis on "national planning", into the following parts:

First. In general, he did not mean what he said.

Second. In part, he meant the opposite of what he said.

Third. In part, he meant what he said, but the percentage thereof is small, and the particulars are hard to locate.

Fourth. That part of his suggestions which have been incorporated into the program of the new deal he meant all the time, but he is reticent in pointing them out.

Fifth. He is certain that he believes in anything, every "bold experiment" the administration pulls off. He believes in anything that will add $2,500 to his salary, plus the opportunity to try out his so-called "sociological" cult on the farmers.

It is obvious that no Senator, after reading Tugwell in his published statements and listening to him on the witness stand, will be able to arrive at any verdict as to the meaning or purpose of Tugwell and the value of his so-called "sociology" to the American farmer. No court would tolerate such a witness on the stand. No jury, in the face of such contradictory testimony, could agree on a verdict.

It is equally obvious that no such Under Secretary of Agriculture could be of any concrete, practical usefulness to the 10,000,000 dirt farmers of the United States. They need somebody who always means what he says, and always says something plain, simple, and direct about a concrete subject of which he has definite knowledge born of trained experience. Agriculture demands and already has experiment stations dealing in actual crops, livestock, and markets. It wants no "bold experiments" in "collectivism" by a self-styled philosopher who functions like a three-card monte sharp or a man who jumps upon a box with three shells and a pea and entertains the public with his cry: "Now you see it and now you don't. Who is the next gent?"

Anyone connected with the Department of Agriculture should be able to speak the American language and say what he means and mean what he says; and what he says should be useful—that is to say, a concrete, definite aid to the farmer, a plain way of helping farm production and marketing, lifting the mortgage and paying the taxes.

Tugwell's approach to farming indicates that he has got only as far as the Old World Machiavellian diplomat Talleyrand, who gave the world the following discoveries in sociology:

First. "Language is invented to conceal thought."

Second. "Society is divided into two classes, the shearers and the shorn. Be sure to stand with the former, and avoid the latter."

Beyond the teachings of Talleyrand, Tugwell does not appear, from what he has written and what he says on the witness stand, to have made any material progress. He is of no use to the farmer, and of no use to the country, except in the way of dangerous consequences, which he himself admits may be fraught with explosive possibilities.

ALIBI NO. 1—GENERAL DENIAL

The first alibi of Professor Tugwell is a general denial that he meant what he said in his national planning thesis published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 8, last.

He now says that he does not favor the plan of the "central group in Washington" regimenting the industries, consumption, and prices of the country, as described in his 5,000-word exegesis before the American Economic Association, on the subject "The Principle of Planning and the Institution of Laissez Faire."

He did not mean it when he said:

> The interest of the liberals among us in the institutions of the new Russia of the Soviets, spreading gradually among puzzled business men, has created wide, popular interest in planning as a possible refuge from persistent insecurity * * *

He did not mean it, he says, when in the opening sentence of his paper before the American Economic Association, he starts out:

> There can be no secure peace in the world so long as its peoples are divided among absolute sovereignties.

He did not mean it, we are now led to presume, when he told the Association:

> We have, at once, illuminating public examples of successful planning, and a hidden development, on a vast scale, of techniques which ought to be brought into the open. But we have enough evidence to make it clear that no technical difficulty bars the way to national planning.

He asks us not to believe the evidence of our eyes when we read his defense of the Russian plan, as follows:

> Most of us ought not to have been quite so free in our predictions that the institutions of Soviet Russia would break down from a lack of motive.

He did not mean it when he wrote the following condemnation of the American business system:

> It ought rather to be a source of wonder that a society could operate at all when profits are allowed to be earned and disposed of as we do it.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, how can we place any confidence in a witness who in the same breath defends the Russian and condemns the American economic system, and does it in a calm and deliberate paper before a convention of economists, and now, when he is a candidate for increase of salary, turns about-face with a flat denial of his disinterested previous utterances? From Tugwell the candidate we must appeal to Tugwell the college professor. From Tugwell the job seeker we appeal to Tugwell the searcher for economic truth. From Tugwell the politician we appeal to Tugwell the teacher.

Did he tell the truth regarding his socialistic beliefs when he addressed the American Economic Association, or did he tell the truth when called before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry? Was he making false and evasive statements to the American Economic Association, or was he making false and evasive statements when cross-examined by Senators, and when he had a salary promotion at stake? That is the question for us to determine as the jury.

He told the association that "the liberals among us" are moved by the "institutions of the new Russia of the Soviets" to a "wide popular interest in planning."

He noted "illuminating public examples of successful planning."

He is convinced that "we have enough evidence to make it clear that no technical difficulty bars the way to national planning."

"Most of us", he told the association, "ought not to have been quite so free in our predictions that the institutions of Soviet Russia would break down."

What now, gentlemen of the Senate, are we to believe? Was he trying to fool the economists, or is he trying to fool us?

ALIBI NO. 2—HE MEANT THE OPPOSITE

He now tells us that he is not a radical; that he is a conservative. There is no "brain trust", he says, and therefore, I presume, no "bold experiments" concocted by them and sold to the President.

He is for the Constitution of the United States, and, I presume, for the constitutions of the 48 sovereign States. These constitutions reserve to the respective States the power over their own intrastate commerce, and the Constitution of the United States gives the Federal Government authority over only interstate and foreign commerce. So, naturally, he believes in all that. He swears to support and uphold the Constitution, because otherwise he could not hold a Federal job. So when he talked about a "national planning", which would override State bounds, he meant the opposite of that.

When he laid before the American Economic Association, in as attractive a form as may be, the "illuminating public examples of successful planning" abroad, he was not a radical; he was a conservative. He believed in the American Constitution and in the Union of the "indestructible States."

Yet, note the views of his contemporaries and associates in the sociological and journalistic field. Note their respective reactions.

Says Ernest K. Lindley, sympathetic author of The Roosevelt Revolution:

Rexford G. Tugwell is the philosopher, the sociologist, and the prophet of the Roosevelt revolution, as well as one of the boldest practitioners; he has provided the movement with much of its rationale.

What does Lindley mean by "the movement"?

Listen to Mark Sullivan:

Professor Tugwell's philosophy is "collectivism."

Then Sullivan cites authorities, friends of Tugwell.

Is "collectivism" a conservative or a radical cult? Is it a development of the provisions of the United States Constitution, or is it subversive of the Constitution and of all the immunities thereof from compulsory social control?

Listen to Walter Lippmann, a supporter of Roosevelt:

Then there is a group, among whom Professor Tugwell is the most conspicuous, who may, I suppose, fairly be called "collectivist."

Mr. President, is it reasonably conceivable that Tugwell has been able to hoodwink his own friends and associates? Has he been fooling them into the belief that he is a radical, when, as he tells us, he has been all the time a conservative?

Listen to the work on The New Dealers:

When you reach Tugwell, you reach very close to the heart of the new deal.

Listen to Frank Kent, of the Democratic Baltimore Sun:

Dr. Tugwell is the irremovable part of the new deal.

Listen again to Mark Sullivan:

There can be no doubt that approval of Professor Tugwell by one of America's two great political parties will be a historic departure.

In other words, Tugwell's general denial, and his specific denials, in the light of his associates in the field of political writing, are absolutely worthless. They are an insult to any intelligent jury. He insults the United States Senate in order to gain a high office from which he can preach "collectivism" as a substitute for American institutions and the Constitution.

ALIBIS NOS. 3, 4, 5—TUGWELL'S ADMISSIONS

His first alibi of a general denial is ruined by his admissions. He admitted to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], that he, Tugwell, still believes, as he held in his published thesis, that the ideal will be reached when "industry is government and government is industry." In that respect, he is an admitted socialist.

He ruins his general alibi when he admits his belief in the new-deal nostrums, though the latter as yet are only temporary expedients of an alleged "emergency." The courts permit them to stand, in violation of the Constitution, purely on the stated ground in the provisions of the respective acts that Congress has proclaimed an "emergency." Without such proclamation of "emergency", it is doubtful if the majority of these "bold experiments" would be countenanced in any court. When Tugwell states his belief in them per se, he admits himself a radical, and as holding doctrines repugnant to the Constitution.

These admissions demonstrate that the temporary regimentation of industry under the N.R.A. and the Blue Eagle, that the "national planning" of the A.A.A. in plowing under crops and slaughtering hogs and cows, and the one and sundry "bold experiments" of the 57 alphabetical varieties, are the entering wedges of Tugwell's "collectivism."

They check with his statement of the coming "movement", now called "new deal", when he told the American Economic Association:

The setting up of even an emasculated and ineffective central coordinating body in Washington will form a nucleus about which recognition may gradually gather.

That is precisely what has been developed during the past year pursuant to the outline of the so-called "revolution's prophet."

It is assumed by the wise men of the French police system, as by the police of Scotland Yard, that a well-laid alibi is the best evidence of guilt. It is the first clue. An innocent man prepares no alibi. A man equipped with an elaborate alibi has need of an alibi. He has a history to conceal. He must defend himself against the convictions produced by direct evidence. The lawyers of the Senate will have no difficulty in reading between the lines of the Tugwell alibi. Any layman can understand that Tugwell has a trail that requires many alibis, and Tugwell has them in plenty.

If he did not realize the consequences of what he was preaching, why did he tell the American Economic Association—

There is no denying that the contemporary situation in the United States has explosive possibilities.

Why did he continue with his picture by saying—

Perhaps our statesmen will give way or be more or less gently removed from duty; perhaps our constitutions and statutes will be revised.

What intelligent interpretation can be placed on his closing words to the American Economic Association—

Yet the new kind of order we have in prospect cannot function in our present economy. The contemporary situation is one in which all choices are hard; yet one of them has to be made.

What does he mean when he says "we have in prospect"? What does he mean when he says the hard choice "has to be made"?

What, finally, did he mean when he asserted—

There may be a long and lingering death, but it must be regarded as inevitable.

That is no idle statement from an economic teacher. It cannot be passed by as a "technical" or "scientific" remark. It is the threat of a fanatic against existing institutions—the prophet of a "new deal."

Mr. President, I ask that the clerk read the following resolution, and I ask Senators to note the names on the letterhead.

AMERICAN COALITION OF PATRIOTIC,
CIVIC AND FRATERNAL SOCIETIES,
Washington, D.C.

Whereas Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell, who has been nominated for Under Secretary of Agriculture, is known to be a pronounced advocate of principles of government which are subversive and inimical to our system of constitutional government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the American Coalition, representing 94 patriotic, civic, and fraternal organizations throughout the United States, that we protest against his confirmation which would amount to an authorization by the Senate of continuance of this radical course and a ratification of his many utterances aimed at the destruction of our most cherished institutions.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
JOHN B. TREVOR, President.

JUNE 9, 1934.

Mr. President, before I close these remarks regarding the constitutional strength and secureness of the United States, I wish to mention that only today was I informed of the plan to commemorate the services of James Madison in the Madison Centennary on June 28 of this year. I understand that the chairman of the Madison memorial day is to be our courageous and distinguished colleague, the Senator from Virginia, HARRY FLOOD BYRD. I have learned that under his chairmanship, information regarding the Madison memorial day has been sent to all parts of the United States, and that each of the 48 States will be represented among those doing honor to the memory of the great Father of our Constitution, James Madison.

Among those approving of this affirmative response to services well performed for the country in great stress in the past history of the United States is a message from a distinguished son of Minnesota, Frank B. Kellogg, who says that he believes the services of James Madison will not be forgotten in all the generations to come, not only for his distinguished services in establishing constitutional government, but also in leaving a record of the proceedings of that historic convention.

Mr. Kellogg went on to say that in times of national depression and great political upheaval the guarantees of the Constitution for a stable government and individual liberty and opportunity are of inestimable value. Then he stated:

It is under the guise of necessity in times of popular excitement that the Nation runs the greatest risks of lessening these constitutional guaranties.

This was foreseen by Madison and his contemporaries and guarded against by the greatest care and foresight in the Constitution itself.

Mr. President, I ask leave to print the following Tugwell questionnaire.

There being no objection, the questionnaire was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTIONS AT HEARING OF DR. REXFORD GUY TUGWELL

By THOMAS D. SCHALL, United States Senator from Minnesota

CHAIRMAN OF SENATE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY. In your hearing on the qualifications of Professor Tugwell for the office of Under Secretary of Agriculture, may I ask the courtesy of your committee to put to Mr. Tugwell the following questions and make them part of the record.

1. What is your experience or contact with agriculture?

2. As teacher and writer in economics and government you have been classed as a "collectivist"? Is that classification correct?

3. How does collectivism differ from socialism or communism? Can you cite examples? How does collectivism differ from the programs of Italy or Russia?

4. Please define the collectivist idea as you would apply it to the United States Government? Also, as applied to American agriculture?

5. In your thesis published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 8, you advocate a national planning system, and appear to favor the plan of Soviet Russia. How does your national planning differ from that of Russia as applied to agriculture?

6. You are quoted as saying that your central group of experts charged with the duty of planning the country's economic life will be ineffective unless endowed with power. Is it your idea that a central group in Washington can govern the agriculture of the 48 States under the present Constitution?

7. You are quoted as saying that it seems altogether likely that we shall set up, and soon, such a consultative body. You then picture the existing order after the new social order becomes effective, in these words:

"There will be a long and lingering death, but it must be regarded as inevitable."

What is your interpretation of that statement, as applied, respectively, to the States, to the Constitution, to American agriculture, and to American liberty?

8. As Under Secretary of Agriculture would you deem it your opportunity and your public duty to put such national planning into effect and secure legislation, or Executive orders, with power so to do?

9. You are quoted as saying: "The first series of changes will have to do with statutes, with constitutions, and with government." Does this imply reconstruction of the "Union of indestructible States" and the substitution of a centralized control from Washington as from Moscow? Will the States be resolved into Federal cantons?

10. You are further quoted as saying: "and it will require the laying of rough, unholy hands on many a sacred precedent, doubtless calling on an enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement." Is it your idea to employ force to override State and county bounds in order to put into effect your ideas of national planning?

11. Does this imply the expansion of the Army and air forces, the employment of the C.C.C. encampments, and the organization of a national police to control the 48 States and 3,000 counties—after some such policing plan as that enforced by the central executive committee of the U.S.S.R.?

12. Do you look upon your function as Under Secretary of Agriculture as akin to that of the commissar for agriculture in the U.S.S.R.? Does the status of the agricultural peasantry of Russia appeal to you as the ideal national planning for the farmers of the United States?

13. As Under Secretary of Agriculture would it be your plan to direct the acreage of each crop planted, the size of the flocks and herds, the methods of crop raising and stock breeding, the marketing and price making; in short, treat the agriculture of 48 States as a Federal institution, instead of 10,000,000 farms run by as many free and independent farmers?

14. What becomes of the status of the respective 48 sovereign States, in the light of your statements, as follows:

(a) "* * * consequently the States are wholly ineffective instruments for control"?

(b) "* * * planning will necessarily become a function of the Federal Government"?

Is your enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement depended upon to reduce the States to a proper obedience?

15. Had you in mind the future status of the States when you announced, "There may be a long and lingering death, but it must be regarded as inevitable"?

16. You object to free competition as involving conflict. Do you foresee no conflict in your plan to use an enlarged and nationalized police power for enforcement upon the 130,000,000 people of 48 States and 3,000 counties?

17. What do you mean when you say: "There is no denying that the contemporary situation in the United States has explosive possibilities"?

18. Had you in mind the Congress of the United States and the Governors of the States when you said:

"Perhaps our statesmen will give way or be more or less gently removed from duty; perhaps our constitutions and statutes will be revised * * *."?

19. Do you take exception to the classification credited to Walter Lippman and Mark Sullivan, that "Professor Tugwell's philosophy is collectivism"?

20. Do you take exception to the characterization given you by Ernest K. Lindley, sympathetic author of "The Roosevelt Revolution", when he says: "Rexford G. Tugwell is the philosopher, the sociologist, and the prophet of the Roosevelt revolution, as well as one of its boldest practitioners; he has provided the movement with much of its rationale"?

21. Can you conscientiously take official oath that you will support and uphold the Constitution of the United States, with its guaranties of peace, justice, liberty, and the rights of the sovereign States?

22. Would not your national planning enforced by a nationalized police power better qualify you for Under Secretary of the Commissar of Agriculture in the U.S.S.R. than in the United States as organized under the present Constitution?

23. Does your national planning include a controlled press? Is the press to be subjected to your "miracle of discipline" as you term it?

24. Among the phrases in your published thesis are these: (1) no "freedom of venture"; (2) no "exemption from compulsory social control"; (3) "unlikely to be allowed freedom of speech." Among the institutions that are to suffer a long and lingering death do you include article I of the American Bill of Rights, guaranteeing freedom of speech and a free press?

25. Is it your idea that in producing the miracle of discipline you will have to follow the examples of Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin in press and telegraphic and radio censorship, as a supplement to the enlarged and nationalized police power?

26. Do you recognize the recent press code, the communications control bill, and the control of banks that finance the publisher and meet his pay rolls—do you recognize these measures as in line with the plan of a controlled press?

27. When you say constitutions may have to be revised—referring doubtless to the Constitution of the United States and the State constitutions—would you eliminate the guarantee of a free press?

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On June 9, 1934:

S. 3380. An act providing for the appointment of Richmond Pearson Hobson, formerly a captain in the United States Navy, as a rear admiral in the Navy, and his retirement in that grade.

On June 11, 1934:

S. 85. An act for the relief of Paul J. Sisk;

S. 176. An act for the relief of Harry Harsin;

S. 256. An act for the relief of Milburn Knapp;

S. 512. An act for the relief of Peter Pierre;

S. 620. An act for the relief of Catherine Wright;

S. 1077. An act for the relief of Lueco R. Gooch;

S. 1430. An act for the relief of M. Thomas Petroy;

S. 1460. An act for the relief of Edgar Stivers;

S. 1516. An act for the relief of Michael Bello;

S. 1772. An act for the relief of the Western Montana Clinic, Missoula, Mont.;

S. 2023. An act for the relief of Claudia L. Polski;

S. 2377. An act for the relief of A. E. Shelley;

S. 2636. An act for the relief of James Slevin;

S. 2790. An act for the relief of the Charlestown Sand & Stone Co., of Elkton, Md.;

S. 2889. An act for the relief of certain Indians of the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont.;

S. 2973. An act for the relief of First Lt. Walter T. Wilsey;

S. 2980. An act to modify the effect of certain Chippewa Indian treaties on areas in Minnesota; and

S. 3540. An act to amend section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933.

On June 12, 1934:

S. 1780. An act to provide for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in alleys in the District of Columbia, and for the replatting and development of squares containing inhabited alleys in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, safety, and welfare, and for other purposes; and

S. 3170. An act to revise air-mail laws and to establish a commission to make a report to the Congress recommending an aviation policy.

REGULATION OF PUBLIC GRAZING LANDS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6462) to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] really raises a rather fundamental question involved in the bill. He states that the wording of the bill as it stands would nullify the homestead law. The amendment which he proposes, I am afraid, would nullify the grazing bill which we are seeking to pass.

Grazing areas are absolutely without value unless there is drinking water for the cattle and sheep which graze upon the areas. A vast grazing district may be laid out with two or three small sources of water, springs or water holes, adequate for stock, but inadequate for irrigation purposes, sources which have been found inadequate as demonstrated by the fact that homesteaders have not located them.

The bill as it stands provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall not permit the location of homesteads taking in these water holes or springs upon which the grazing area depends, but imposes a still further limitation, that such water holes and springs, in order to be excepted from the homestead provisions, must have been developed or improved by the holder of the grazing permit. In other words, if a man with a grazing permit goes upon the land covered within the district and develops a source of drinking water for his cattle, this measure as it now stands provides that some homesteader, or someone under the guise of a homesteader, may not come in and locate about this water hole a homestead, thereby, in substance, drying up the whole grazing area.

It seems to me absolutely essential, if we are to maintain grazing districts, that the water upon which the grazing districts depend must be protected against those who would go in, locate a little water hole, and thereby exclude those who have grazing permits.

I would emphasize the fact that the only water holes which are excepted from homesteads are those which have been developed or improved by the man who holds the permit, and the amendment would permit someone to come in who had not developed, who had not improved, and take advantage of the situation, and, in substance, exclude the permittee.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is exactly correct when he speaks of the value of water in the Western States so far as the cattle and the sheep are concerned. I think I am exactly correct when I speak of the value of water to human beings who may try to homestead land in that arid region.

It is not, as the Senator from Colorado has said, for the purpose of nullification of the bill that the amendment is proposed. The section of the bill to which the amendment is directed would give the Secretary of the Interior authority and power to classify and open to public settlement such lands as may be chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes.

This land is not thrown open automatically to settlement. On the contrary, the bill would withdraw all the land from entry and settlement, and would only permit homestead entry in those cases and on those lands where the Secretary had opened the land to settlement.

If the Senator from Colorado can imagine a case where the Secretary of the Interior would open to public settlement a small area of 40 or 60 acres because it had one little water hole on it, if that is the sort of administration the bill is to receive, then the measure should be defeated now.

But, Mr. President, the bill will not be administered in that fashion; and this is simply an effort to give to section 7 some purport and meaning. I dislike the type of legislation which holds out to anyone the hope that he may go out into the West and take up some land and build a home. That is what the first part of section 7 does. It says that lands chiefly valuable for agriculture may be thrown open to settlement, and leads me and the people of my State to believe that we may yet encourage settlement of those lands, and that they may some day pass into private ownership. I know, however, and every other western Senator knows, that if the language dealing with all land upon which there is water, which has been developed, which has been improved by the permittee, shall remain in the bill there will be no settlement and no homestead entry of such land.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is aware, of course, that this bill applies to less than one-half of the remaining public domain.

Mr. HATCH. I am aware of that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So that homesteading may continue without any obstacle in more than one-half of the remaining public domain, regardless of this bill.

Mr. HATCH. It makes no difference how much is left. If lands which are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes are not to be permitted to be homesteaded, then this section has no meaning, and that is the effect of the proviso in the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator construe the bill to provide that there may be no more homesteading unless the Secretary classifies the land?

Mr. HATCH. I am speaking now as to the lands embraced in the bill. Of course I do not refer to the lands which are not covered by the terms of the bill, to which the Senator from Wyoming refers. I am speaking now as to the lands covered in the bill.

Mr. President, I submit that the amendment should be adopted and that there will be no injurious result to anyone, for if the land is not chiefly valuable for agriculture the Secretary will not open it to settlement. If it is chiefly valuable for agriculture it should be open to settlement. As to the other language in the bill, if this amendment shall be defeated I will offer another immediately afterward.

Mr. ERICKSON. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the amendment under discussion. If section 7 shall remain as it now is in the bill, it simply will not mean anything.

The first part of the section provides that the right of homestead may be continued, giving the Secretary of the Interior the right to classify these lands. Then it provides that no land with any water on it shall be included in this classification and be open to homestead.

It is true, as has been said here, that either these public lands must be dedicated entirely to the stock interests, and the homesteads eliminated, or else this section cannot stand.

It seems to me the time has not yet come when we should say to the homeseeker, the man with the family, the man without a home, that he no longer has any right to the public domain for a home. We should not forget that the public lands in this great country in the early days were dedicated to the homeseeker and the homebuilder, and upon the public lands millions of prosperous homes have been located. Now we are asked to say in this day, when there are millions of homeless, that if there remain any portions of the public land which are suitable for homesteads, the right to make homes there shall be denied.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that either this amendment should be adopted, or else the entire section should be stricken from the bill. Let us not pretend that by this bill we are holding forth to the homeless the right to homestead, because we are not doing it. When one is denied a piece of land because there is a spring on it, or a little stream, or a water hole, he is simply denied a privilege that was intended to go with this great public domain of ours. If it is the purpose to sound the final death knell to the homestead, if we are to have no more homes located on the public domain, very well; let this section remain as it is, without amendment.

I admit that perhaps there is not very much of the public domain now left which is suitable for homes. Yet I know there are some portions of it, there are some places where a homesteader might dam up a coulee, develop his spring, have a garden, have milch cows, and have irrigation plants, if he were permitted to do so.

I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, line 19, immediately after the period, it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following:

Except that no renewal of any such permit shall be denied, if such denial will impair the value of the livestock unit of the permittee, if such unit is pledged as security for any bona fide loan.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is an amendment to an amendment of the committee, heretofore agreed to. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Navada to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place, the following:

SEC. 16. Nothing in this act shall be construed as restricting the respective States from enforcing any and all statutes enacted for police regulation, nor shall the police power of the respective States be, by this bill, impaired or restricted, and all laws heretofore enacted by the respective States or any thereof, or that may hereafter be enacted as regards public health or public welfare, shall at all times be in full force and effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment.

If there be no further amendment to be proposed the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT SYSTEM

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3231) to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONERGAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 3231) to provide a retirement system for railroad employees, to provide unemployment relief, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the bill as now before the Senate is in the form of an amendment to the bill originally introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], being an amendment reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert.

It is the result of some 2 or 3 years of effort and negotiation on the part of those who have been interested in a pension system for railway employees. As Senators may remember, at the last session there were two bills introduced providing for a pension system for railway employees. One bill was sponsored by the executives of the railroad organization and the other by a band of independent employees. Hearings were held by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce through a subcommittee, but no agreement could be reached. At this session another subcommittee was appointed, hearings were held, negotiations were conducted for some weeks between the two disagreeing factions, and finally the bill was agreed upon as now reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce in its amended form.

I shall not attempt to describe the bill in any detail, as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are better informed than I am with reference to it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, as the able Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] has just stated, the bill now before the Senate is the outcome of consideration and negotiations relating to a bill which has been before the Committee on Interstate Commerce for the past 2 years. Extensive hearings were held. Two bills were before the committee. Finally the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and I collaborated on the two bills, taking what was good from both, and reporting a new bill. The bill was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, where another subcommittee was appointed for further consideration of the proposed legislation. The bill before us at the present moment represents the efforts of at least two subcommittees, to say nothing of the labors of individual Senators.

Mr. President, this bill, while specifically designed to provide a retirement fund for railroad workers, is one of the few legislative measures which will make possible the employment of the many thousands of railroad workers furloughed or laid off during the depression. In fact, Mr. President, I am advised that the enactment of this measure will provide work opportunities for more than 100,000 unemployed railroad workers within a reasonable period of time. The bill proposes a single unified railroad retirement system for all railroad employees which can immediately be put into practical operation.

Mr. President, it is absolutely essential that I have the attention of Senators, for the reason that the subject which I propose to discuss is a technical one, one largely understood only by actuaries—men who have given their entire lives to the subject matter.

The steps taken are:

First. The President is to appoint a board of three members to administer the act. For this purpose the President will obtain, in such manner as he may choose, the recommendation of the employees and the carriers.

Second. The board is authorized to require that the carriers make advances against future payments as necessary to put the act into operation.

Third. Beginning the first day of the second month after the bill becomes a law, designated in the bill the effective date, the employees and the carriers begin making contributions, which are deducted from the employees' wages and paid quarterly or as the board may otherwise direct into the Treasury of the United States.

I may say that no expense is to be incurred by the Government of the United States. The entire fund is made up by the railway employees and by the railway companies. On the basis of present total wages of $1,500,000,000 in round figures, the amount to be paid in during the first 6 months by employees will be $15,000,000, and by the railroads $30,000,000, or a total of $45,000,000. This will be on hand before any pension payments are to be made.

Fourth. Pension payments are to be made monthly and are to begin at the end of 6 months from the effective date. The report submitted with the bill estimates for the first year of operation total pension payments paid in excess of $50,000,000. This would require a total monthly payment of $4,167,000 to meet which there will be available the accumulated $45,000,000, with a continuing income of $7,500,000 per month. There will accordingly be ample funds available for the current payment of pensions.

Fifth. The actuaries' estimates show that the 2 percent paid by employees on the wages, with twice that amount paid by the carriers currently, will more than provide for all pension payments and expenses during the first 4-year experience period, and undoubtedly will be more than sufficient for a much longer time. These figures are based on a 2-percent payment by employees on their compensation. The bill contemplates the accumulation of an excess fund for contingencies, but the board may in its discretion adjust the payments by the employees and carriers to the amounts required.

Sixth. The first 4 years of operation is intended to accumulate experience and data upon which the Congress can make such modifications in the system as in the light of experience may be found necessary or desirable.

COST IN TOTAL PENSION PAYMENTS

While the board is authorized to require one-third from the employees and two-thirds from the carriers, such combined payments as are necessary to provide the current pension payments, it is certain that during the earlier years the 2 percent of the employees' wages used as a basis, with the corresponding carrier contribution, will more than provide for all pension payments and leave a substantial margin.

The total cost in pension payments during the first full year of operation is estimated at possibly $50,000,000 or not to exceed $60,000,000.

These estimates are based on the testimony of Mr. Eddy, chairman pension committee, Standard Railroad Labor Executives, that the total first-year retirements will not exceed 50,000 employees, which, on the basis of an average pension of $83.33 a month, or $1,000 a year, will require a total of $50,000,000.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that is absolutely correct. I recall that some 20 years ago, when the Legislature of the State of West Virginia undertook to enact a compensation law it was found there were no industrial statistics upon which to base a rate, and it was necessary for the legislature to go elsewhere to secure statistics. They took the German method of regulation for the establishment of an adequate compensation system for the State of West Virginia. That was in the year 1913.

The purpose of the bill for the first 4 years would be an experimental one, so that data may be developed, and statistics and records prepared which will result in the board being able, at the conclusion of that time, to report to the Congress or to its appropriate committee what will be necessary in the way of amendments to secure a continuation of the principle, which I believe is a most humane one.

RETIREMENTS WILL BE FAR BELOW MAXIMUM

The testimony of Dr. Charles E. Brooke, actuary for the Railroad Employees National Pension Association, shows that out of the approximately 1,250,000 employees in 1932 there would be 75,000 who could retire at the age of 65 and over in 1934. However, the retirement is optional to the extent that the employee under an agreement with the carrier made from year to year may continue in the service but not beyond the age of 70 years.

In other words, 65 years is the age for retirement, but by a joint agreement between the employer and the employee an additional 5 years may be agreed upon. As the number in the group who are 70 years of age and over is only about 25,000, it is obvious that a large part of the 75,000 would not be required to retire immediately, and probably would not do so.

There is in the bill a provision permitting the retirement of those who are under the age of 65 years after 30 years of service. This would increase the maximum possible immediate retirements by about 40,000, to about 115,000. The probability that these additional 40,000 employees would retire immediately is very remote, and is greatly diminished by the fact that the pension is reduced by 4 percent of the wage for each year the employee is less than 65 years of age at the time of retirement.

To illustrate, an employee who would be entitled to receive a pension of 60 percent after 30 years of service at the age of 65 years would receive only a pension of 40 percent on retiring at the age of 60, or only a pension of 20 percent on retiring at the age of 55 years.

It is obvious that there will be few retirements at these younger ages on such small pensions, especially as the employee can obtain a materially increased pension by continuing a few years more in the service.

PENSION COSTS REASONABLE

From the foregoing it is fair to assume that the number of retirements during the first year of operation may be about 50,000, and will not exceed 60,000. In other words, about half as many will be retired during the first full year of operation as could possibly be retired if all elected to do so who are at or above age 60.

It is therefore obvious from all the figures submitted at the hearings that even if the number actually retiring immediately greatly exceeds one-half of those who could do so as estimated at the hearings, the actual requirements for pension payments during the first year will be less than $50,000,000, and during the earlier years, extending well beyond the 4-year preliminary-experience period, will be well within the payment of $60,000,000 annually to be provided by the carriers and $30,000,000 annually to be provided by the employees on the 2-percent basis.

Mr. President, I think the railway employees of this land have been very considerate, very enthusiastic in their attitude in going along with the employer to make up this fund, and I think they are entitled to a great deal of commendation for this attitude.

The figures for the possible maximum pension payments, in case all who can do so retire immediately, have been given by the actuaries at the hearings. It should be kept in mind that because the actual retirements have been estimated at about one-half of the possible maximum, the actual pension payments will be reduced somewhat proportionately from the maximum figures given by the actuaries.

DR. BROOKS' MAXIMUM FIGURES

The figures furnished by Dr. Brooks show in detail a total possible maximum of $87,500,000 pension payments during the first full year of making pension payments. This assumes that all the 115,000 employees entitled to do so who are 60 years of age or over would retire immediately.

Dr. Brooks' figures further show total possible maximum pension payments of $61,000,000 for the first year, assuming that the 75,000 employees who are 65 years of age and over retire immediately, and that there are no retirements below age 65.

In either case there will be a gradual increase in the figures from year to year arising from current retirements in excess of the deaths, and amounting to approximately $7,000,000 per year in the earlier years. This would bring the possible maximum pension payments the fourth year to $117,500,000 in the first case, assuming that all entitled to do so immediately retire at age 60 and over, and to $91,000,000 in the second case, assuming immediate retirements by all entitled to do so at age 65 and over, and no retirements below that age.

As these maximum pension payments can in no event be reached, and the probabilities are that during the earlier years the number of retirements will be in the neighborhood of one-half the possible maximum, it is probable that the total pension requirements during the first 4 or 5 years of operation will range between one-half and two-thirds of the amounts above mentioned.

It is necessary to allow a wide range, because of the absolute impossibility of determining in advance the extent to which employees, who have an option with regard to retiring or continuing in the service, will take advantage of the opportunity to enter upon a pension before the retirement becomes compulsory.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HATFIELD. I do.

Mr. WHITE. Has the Senator any figures which would throw light on the cost of this system above the amounts which the railroads are now paying in retirement pensions?

Mr. HATFIELD. The evidence given before the committee at the hearings on the bill was that the railways throughout the country combined were contributing to a voluntary pension fund, developed by the railway companies themselves, something around $34,000,000 a year.

Under this bill there will be paid into the new system $60,000,000 a year by the carriers.

This bill will relieve the railroads of great burdens from future pensions, which would have to be granted in continuing their present systems. The current payments of pensions under these present systems will rapidly decline, and the $60,000,000 payment will therefore absorb a large part of what may remain of the annual payments under present systems.

ACTUARY BREIBY'S MAXIMUM FIGURES

Actuary Breiby, testifying for the railroad carriers, stated that over a period of 27 years, from 1934 to 1961, on the basis of estimated total operating revenues of $160,000,000,000, out of which $77,000,000,000 would be paid in employee compensation, the total pension cost would be $5,800,000,000. As the bill provides that one-third is to be paid by the employees, the remaining two-thirds, or $3,900,000,000, to be paid by the railroad carriers will be less than 2½ percent of the operating revenues for the 27 years.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONERGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator recall what proportion of the railroads are now using the pension system?

Mr. HATFIELD. I do not recall exactly, but it is a very large percentage, but I understand that railways employing 90 percent of the employees now have such pension systems.

Mr. FESS. What proportion of all the railroad transportation would be classified as class 1?

Mr. HATFIELD. More than 90 percent.

Mr. FESS. I do not recall the figures, but does the Senator recollect the basis of the cost of the present system? Under the proposed system, would a larger percentage be paid by the railroads?

Mr. HATFIELD. It is, of course, obvious that their percentage will be less as the employees are to pay one-third the cost under this bill.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. I notice from the report accompanying the bill that it is stated that there is some form of retirement pension plan covering 90 percent of the entire mileage.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is as I recall it.

Mr. President, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], I should be very glad, if it is agreeable, to finish my statement in the morning, leaving the bill the unfinished business, with the understanding that I may be recognized when the Senate convenes. It will take me but a short time to complete the statement.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think the Senator should finish his statement. He is in the midst of it. I hope he will conclude this evening.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am agreeable to proceeding now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk informs the Chair that the calendar will be in order when the Senate shall convene tomorrow.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there is no opposition to the pending bill, and I think it should be disposed of tonight.

Mr. DILL. Let the Senator from West Virginia conclude his address.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am perfectly agreeable to finishing this evening.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I suggest that we conclude the session at this time. It is nearly half past 5; Senators are tired, and would like to go home, and we can proceed with the bill tomorrow. There are many on this side and on the other side who should be here when the matter is being so thoroughly discussed.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have only a little more to say.

Mr. COUZENS. I hope there is no understanding that the bill is to be laid aside tomorrow morning.

Mr. MCNARY. There is none, except that it is to be laid aside from 11 to 1, so that we may consider the calendar. That has been agreed to.

Mr. COUZENS. This is a very important measure, and time is getting short. I should like to see the consideration of the bill concluded tonight, rather than have it delayed tomorrow by being laid aside while we take 2 hours on the calendar.

Mr. MCNARY. It would be impossible to finish it tonight.

Mr. DILL. My thought was that the Senator from West Virginia might finish his speech, and that we could then lay the bill aside.

Mr. HATFIELD. It is not a speech; it is an explanatory statement.

Mr. DILL. I think it ought to be finished.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think I ought to explain that there is no limitation in the agreement that was entered into, in the time for the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar tomorrow. The object of the agreement that was entered into was, and my request was, to provide for completing the call of the calendar of unobjected bills. This is probably the last opportunity that will be afforded during the present session. I do not anticipate, however, that it will require more than 2 or 3 hours at most. But I think the Senator from West Virginia should be permitted to conclude his speech this afternoon. I do not think it will be possible to dispose of the bill tonight.

Mr. MCNARY. I am perfectly willing that we should proceed, with the understanding that the Senate will take a recess at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MCNARY. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator know of any addresses to be delivered in opposition to the proposed legislation?

Mr. MCNARY. I am not aware of any, but I do know that some Senators have amendments they desire to offer to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to state that I am sure that it is not practicable to complete the consideration of the bill this afternoon. I myself am anxious to facilitate its passage as much as possible, but I understand the circumstances to which the Senator from Oregon refers impliedly, and I think that when the Senator from West Virginia shall conclude his remarks, we should hold a brief executive session, and then take a recess.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas whether it would be possible tonight to reach an agreement as to the time tomorrow when we may vote upon the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not believe that is either necessary or practicable.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator believes we can finish the consideration of the bill tomorrow?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it will require only some 2 or 3 hours to complete the consideration of the bill, from what I know, and that we may remain in session tomorrow until it shall be disposed of. There is, however, an Executive nomination on the calendar, reported today by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which I expect to ask the Senate to proceed with some time tomorrow.

Mr. WAGNER. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it should be noted that the estimates of possible pension payments made by Actuary Breiby in testifying for the carriers assumed, among other differences, retirements down to age 55 and a materially higher basic wage, and are in excess of the estimates made by Actuaries Charles E. Brooks and Henry R. Corbett in testifying for the employee organizations.

It is recognized by all that the larger requirements for pension payments would not arise during the earlier years, and that many years must elapse before there will be need for payment of 2½ percent by the employees on their compensation. As heretofore indicated, it is clear that payments on the basis of 2 percent by the employees on their compensation will be more than sufficient for many years to come even if there shall be no increase in total compensation paid to employees.

Even on the basis of such higher basic wage, the cost figures during the first 4 or 5 years of operation are well within the payments into the fund which would be made on the basis of 2 percent of the employees' wage.

The 2-percent-basis payment on minimum aggregate wages of $1,500,000,000 would provide a payment into the fund by the employees of $30,000,000, and $60,000,000 by the carriers, or a total of $90,000,000 a year.

The total wage payments are now materially less than one-half of what these payments were in different years prior to 1929. As the total wage payments again increase, the percentages required to provide for the pensions will be proportionately decreased. There will be no proportionate increase in pension payments, in that for years to come the pension payments will arise almost wholly out of service before the taking effect of the act.

PROPORTIONATE PENSION COST SMALL

There surely can be little question as to the ability of the carriers to stand an immediate expense of $40,000,000 or even $60,000,000, with the employees ready to pay half as much more to provide for the retirement of aged employees on a satisfactory permanent plan.

At the most, except as to the possible increased number of immediate retirements, the proposed pension cost is little or no more than the carriers already have in prospect under their existing plans, if these are to be continued in operation. In other words, the cost of the voluntary pension plans as these are now carried on by the railroad companies will greatly increase as the years go by.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I have not examined the bill carefully, though I propose to do so. Is there a provision to increase the rate of contribution both by the railroads and by the employees?

Mr. HATFIELD. The rates of contribution are subject to adjustment from time to time by the board.

Mr. HEBERT. The reason why I made that inquiry is this: The entire contribution now is based upon a wage of $1,500,000,000 a year, and the contribution provided in the bill, as I understand, will yield $60,000,000 a year.

Mr. HATFIELD. I may say to the Senator that that is what it will yield on the side of the carriers, and an additional $30,000,000 from the employees.

Mr. HEBERT. Yes; which I understand is estimated to be sufficient to take care of these pensions. Suppose the wage is reduced to $1,000,000,000, the pension fund will be reduced by one-third. Will that be sufficient to take care of the pension payments?

Mr. HATFIELD. The fund will always be sufficient under the authority of the Board to adjust the contributions from time to time; however, Congress is in session every year, and what the Senator suggests will be a contingency with which Congress may deal, in case such a condition should develop, just as a State legislature would deal with a problem of that nature, in case of a deficiency in the operation of the compensation law.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of making a suggestion?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. DILL. There are two things which might occur. For one thing, the Board would have the power to vary the rate.

Mr. HEBERT. That is the question I asked; whether the Board would have that power.

Mr. DILL. Yes; the Board would have that power. The idea is that as the rate of wages decreases the rate of new pensions will decrease.

Mr. HEBERT. It is not so much a question of decrease in the rate of wage as it is a decrease in the total payment of wages.

Mr. DILL. But the Board has the power to vary the rate, anyway.

Mr. HEBERT. That is the question I have in mind.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it fair to assume that the general approval of this measure expressed here this afternoon is fortified by actuarial standards and tests, as well as by the careful scrutiny and approval of the Hon. Joseph B. Eastman, Coordinator of Transportation?

Mr. HATFIELD. The rates and the costs, I will say to the Senator, have been approved by outstanding actuarial authorities such as Dr. Brooks, who formerly was connected with Northwestern University at Evanston, Ill., and the University of California at Berkeley, and also with the War Risk Insurance and the Carnegie Teachers Insurance and Annuity Association and has for years been engaged in pension work. Mr. Corbett, an actuary who represented the 21 brotherhoods, whose place of business is located in the city of Chicago also approved the estimates, Mr. Breiby, actuary for the railroads, whose business location is in the city of New York, thought possibly it would cost more. I discussed the conclusions of Mr. Breiby just a few moments ago, and I am quite sure the Senator remembers my statement of Mr. Breiby's position.

I do not think, Mr. President, there is any question but what this is a sound, stable basis upon which to predicate this fund, and in my judgment it will carry, and carry well. Instead of the fund falling off, it will increase as business increases, and as we come back to normal.

Their pension and relief payments—that is, the railroad companies—already amount to $34,000,000 a year. Even if the new pension payments for the first year and some years to follow might in large part be in addition to payments under present plans, a total carrier payment of $50,000,000 or even $60,000,000 amounts to less than 2 percent upon the present very low operating revenue of between $3,000,000,000 and $3,500,000,000.

As is shown by the testimony, the aggregate reports of the carriers for the early months of the present year show a material improvement in the operating revenues and in the margin between the operating revenues and operating expenses. It should also be noted that in these difficult times the carriers were able to charge off for depreciation in equipment alone in 1932, $190,000,000, against which a proposed carrier pension cost, in 1935, of $60,000,000 for human depreciation is a very modest sum.

The bill recognizes the necessity and desirability of taking over and combining existing systems now in operation, and authority is given to the Board to make arrangements for this purpose and to relieve any carrier from its obligations and to assume such obligations under such conditions as may be agreed upon.

It is, however, provided that the burdens to be assumed by the system shall not be in excess of those otherwise assumed in compliance with the provisions of the proposed act.

A further option is given to the Board to provide that all former employees of all carriers who, prior to the effective date, have become separated from the Service at the age of 70 years or over may be given the benefits of the act.

Until such arrangements or decisions are made by the Board, the existing pension systems of the railroads will not be affected as to pensions already being paid. However, it may be assumed that as all employees in or connected with the service on the taking effect of the act will come under the act, pensions will not thereafter be paid under existing railway pension systems to such employees as come under the act.

The amended bill, as reported by the committee, differs from the original Senate bill 3231 in the following respects:

Section 1: (a) In defining the term "carrier", the words "or the Interstate Commerce Act" are omitted, to make it clear that this does not include carriers other than those subject to the Railway Labor Act.

(b) The definition of the term "employee" is simplified by omitting the reference to a specific date. The inclusion of representatives of employee organizations has been revised to conform to the new section 7 of the amendment. In the same connection, the reference to an "employee organization" has been omitted in the other definitions and other parts of the amendment, and a new definition under (k), "Voluntary Contribution", is included, having reference only to representatives of employee organizations.

(f) The term "service period" is defined more specifically in the amendment.

(g) In the definition of the term "retirement" there have been added the words "with the right to receive an annuity."

Section 2: This section is in part section 9, and is now introduced by a statement of the purpose of the act. The preliminary experience period in the old section 9 is changed from 10 years to require the making within 4 years of a special report on changes to insure the adequacy and permanency of the system.

Section 3: This is former section 2, with a change in the definition of the "monthly compensation" to be the average of the monthly compensation except for service before the effective date, when it is to be the average of the monthly compensation for any 12 consecutive months selected by the employee. There is a further change which retains 60 percent of the compensation as the maximum pension, but permits an increase of the maximum to not exceeding 75 percent after 30 years from the taking effect of the act.

There is also added to the new section 3 a provision for the payment of a death benefit equal to the net accumulation from the employee payments less any annuity payments.

Section 4: Section 4 of the old bill, providing for disability benefits, is omitted.

Section 4 of the amendment is the same as section 3 of the original bill, except that the reference to an "executive position" is changed to an "official position" in the exception from the compulsory retirement provision.

Section 5 of the amendment omits the provision in the former section 5 for additional percentage payments and the accumulations to the individual employee, and the application of such accumulations to provide annuities and death benefits. The new section 5 provides for an employee contribution of a percentage of his compensation which, until otherwise fixed by the Board, is to be 2 percent. The carrier contribution is made twice the employee contribution. In determining the contribution percentage, the Board is required to provide for annuities, other disbursements, and expenses, with a reasonable margin for contingencies.

Section 6 is the same as the original section 6, with an additional provision giving the Board, at its option, in lieu of the other provisions of the section, the right to extend the provisions of the act to all former employees of carriers 70 years of age or over.

Section 7 of the amendment is new and provides that an employee representative of an employee organization may, at his option, continue or become a beneficiary, subject to specified conditions, by paying the combined contributions of an employee and a carrier.

Section 8 is the former section 7 rewritten to provide specifically for a separate "railroad retirement fund" in the United States Treasury.

Section 9 is the same as section 8 except that the first part has been rewritten, changing the number of members of the board from 3 to 5, and the initial terms to 2, 3, and 4 years, with regular terms of 5 years.

Section 10, relating to court jurisdiction, is unchanged.

Section 11 is changed by striking out the words "credit" and "disability."

Section 12, penalizing the carrier for delay in payment, is the same as former section 12.

Section 13, providing general penalties, is the same as former section 13, inserting the words "willfully" and "knowingly."

Section 14 is the same as former section 14.

In further reply to the able Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] respecting the Administrator of Railroads, Mr. Eastman, I will say that Mr. Eastman appeared before our committee and made some suggestions in the way of amendments. He also stated to the committee, Mr. President, that he was not ready at this time to recommend that the Congress pass this measure, but I understand that Mr. Eastman is arriving at some definite conclusion with the railway employees who are interested in this legislation as to the kind of legislation which he would approve, and he has suggested some amendments which have been incorporated in this bill. I understand that there has been a joint meeting between the representatives of Mr. Eastman's office and the representatives of the railway employees and that they have come to some agreement as a result of which it is hoped that Mr. Eastman will favor this legislation.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say that all the railroad brotherhoods and railroad organizations and workers are for the pending bill.

Mr. HATFIELD. One hundred percent, Mr. President. They are enthusiastically for it. I take it that the Senator from Pennsylvania has received telegrams and has had visits to his office which compel him to arrive at the conclusion at which I have arrived, that the railroad employees throughout this country are very strongly for this legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I desire to state some convictions which I have of my own, based upon 25 years of public life.

The dissatisfaction of employees so often found in the industry of our country, in my judgment, is due to their anxiety about the future. They are painfully aware of the fact that their wages do not permit them to save for the inevitable rainy day which eventually comes with old age. They are told that profit sharing is inequitable for the reason that they do not share losses, and that other methods are just as impractical. So my conviction, after considerable study of the problem, is that the best way to secure the peace and contentment of the workingman is by means of a mutual pension system such as is provided for in the Hatfield-Wagner bill, S. 3231, which will provide for those who have given the best part of their lives to the service of the railroad industry.

I have long entertained the conviction that the railways of this country should pay pensions to their worn-out employees, just as industry in 44 of the States and the District of Columbia is required to pay compensation for disabilities arising in industries. The problem can be met by accumulating a fund, based on sound actuarial principles, to pay pensions to those who, in the sunset of their life, are no longer able to render the efficient service they so willingly gave to the industry in their earlier years.

Under our taxing- and rate-regulating laws the railways are permitted to take into consideration a depreciation of the physical structure of their industry, not only for the purposes of taxation, but also in the matter of rate making. Why should we not give the same consideration to depreciation of the investment of the railways and of the workers in the human equation.

This same idea, if developed for every basic industry in America, would go a long way in stabilizing our economic well-being, and it would serve to bring about a harmonious union between labor and capital. It would establish an amicable understanding that would eliminate misery, distress, and discontentment. The sad experiences of the past, such as disastrous labor disputes, would seldom occur for the reason that the toiler would feel that employers were showing an interest in the workers' welfare which has not been shown in most cases in past years.

His interest, therefore, would be like the investment of the individuals who furnished the capital that makes possible the founding, operation, and development of the industry.

Workingmen are the essential part of every industry and greater care and consideration should be shown to them than is given to the machinery and other physical equipment. The life, strength, and skill of the worker should not be used with the thought that later when he becomes a broken old man he will be cast away like a rotten tie or some other essential physical part of the industry that has disintegrated by constant wear, year after year.

These principles should all be based on reasonableness. They must be based upon equity and justice, and the impossible must not be demanded.

Much has been accomplished through the passing years in the interest of the workingman. His hours of labor have been shortened. There was a time when 14 and even 16 hours was demanded of him as an average workday. Then a reduction to 10 hours a day was decreed by many industries, and later the 8-hour day was established in most of the large industries throughout the land. At the present time some plants have shortened the work day to 6 hours.

The average wage earned by laboring men in 1860 was approximately $285 a year. The average wage in 1932 was approximately $1,000 a year.

My sympathy has always been with the toilers, as I fully understand it is they who developed and it is they who must support whatever civilization and progress we are to enjoy in the future.

Mr. President, I think there is no question that the enactment of this legislation will bring to the million railway employees of the land greater satisfaction than any act which has been considered by the Congress up to this time or that may be considered by any succeeding Congress, unless it be upon a subject which will provide for the employees of all industry of the land setting aside a certain amount of their daily, weekly, monthly, or annual earnings, together with a contribution from the industries which employ them, which will finally result in the accumulation of a nest egg to which they can look for protection, for housing, for clothing, and for food, when that time comes that they can no longer earn a living by the sweat of their brow.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can men who are not now working get the benefits of the system; I refer to men who had been in the railroad service for 15 or 20 years, but cannot now get any work and have had no work for 2 or 3 years?

Mr. HATFIELD. They can get the benefits if they have some continuing employment relationship with the railroads. That is as far as we can go. They will also get the benefits of their former service if reinstated. Better than that, the retirement of some 50,000 of men who are 65 years of age or more, or who have worked for a longer period than 30 years, will create vacancies for the reemployment of many of those men, and they will be recalled to the positions which they occupied previous to the time the depression came on, or before their connection was severed because of the increased efficiency of machinery which has been adopted by industry.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is retirement compulsory after 30 years?

Mr. HATFIELD. No; retirement is compulsory after age 65, but the period of employment may be extended for 5 years to age 70 by mutual agreement between the employer and the employee. Retirement on a reduced pension is optional with the employee after 30 years of service.

MONOCACY BATTLEFIELD NATIONAL MILITARY PARK

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, from the Committtee on Public Lands and Surveys, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H.R. 7982) to establish a national military park at the battlefield of Monocacy, Md., and I submit a report (No. 1403) thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the bill which has just been reported by the Senator from New York is a bill for which I desire to ask immediate consideration. We are very anxious that the ceremony in connection with the dedication of the military park may occur in connection with and as a part of the Maryland tercentenary exercises. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have discussed this matter with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. I think the two Maryland Senators are cooperating in the matter. I have no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I hope the bill may be considered and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H.R. 7982) to establish a national military park in the battlefield of Monocacy, Md., was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

"WHY REPORTERS LIKE ROOSEVELT"—ARTICLE BY RAYMOND CLAPPER

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that there may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD an article published in the Review of Reviews and World's Work for June 1934, from the pen of Mr. Raymond Clapper, entitled "Why Reporters Like Roosevelt."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Review of Reviews and World's Work of June 1934]

WHY REPORTERS LIKE ROOSEVELT

By Raymond Clapper

Newspaper reporters at Washington are hard and exacting critics, particularly of Presidents. It is not that they are born cynics. Your cub reporter begins his career fairly bursting with ideals. There is a touch of Don Quixote in him. Otherwise he would go to work at something which might, if he were lucky, make him rich. It is only after years of disillusionment that these trusting souls become hardened. In response to the laws of evolution they gradually acquire that fishy eye which gives the newspaper man the reputation of being a suspicious, doubting fellow, who thinks not very highly of his fellow man.

They get that way even around the White House. Have they not time and again heard a President profess ignorance about a matter when they knew he had discussed it at length with several advisers? They have heard a President say he did not know what man he would appoint to a Cabinet post, and have gone out of the Executive office to learn that the nomination already was speeding toward the Senate. They are inclined to judge a President not in the more majestic moments when the scarlet-coated Marine Band is playing "Hail to the Chief", but in his more human role, when he is in his working clothes wrestling with the details of the greatest executive and political job on earth.

So their judgments, as they talk in the pressroom, are of the man and not the office. They are as frank, as coolly detached, as if the subject on the dissecting table were the chief of police,

President Wilson they seldom saw. In general they were inclined to regard him as a great man scarred somewhat with egotism and petulance. He was a rather remote, Olympian figure even to newspaper men. Harding, on the other hand, was known by most newspaper men from his Senate days. He was liked as a good fellow and a well-meaning man, though many correspondents felt that he was not equal to the demands of the office. Coolidge they at first regarded as a joke. Then they found him amusing. Finally they came to regard him as a shrewd politician with plenty of Yankee common sense; not the great wise man that his legend made him, but smart enough to ride his tide and scramble to shore at the right time.

Hoover was regarded as a poor politician. Many newspaper men had predicted he would make an able President because of his career as an administrator. But most of them came to have doubts about almost everything he did. A man could scarcely be wrong as consistently as most Washington newspaper men thought Hoover was. He was a victim of the times, in part, but personal relations between him and the newspaper corps became so strained that he went out of office generally unpopular with them.

So it seemed as though no President would be able to please the critical fourth estate, and certainly a good many did not expect that Mr. Roosevelt would be able to. An accurate reflection of the state of mind among the Washington correspondents who were awaiting the arrival of the new President is recorded in a dispatch to Editor and Publisher from its Washington representative, carried in the issue of March 4, 1933, the very day Mr. Roosevelt took office. This dispatch, after reporting the Roosevelt plans for franker press relations, added: "In fairness to both Mr. Roosevelt and the press, however, it must be recorded that the new deal in press relations is hoped for rather than actually expected by the correspondents."

Mr. Roosevelt came on to Washington. The correspondents saw him and were conquered. He won them and he has still a larger proportion of them personally sympathetic than any of his recent predecessors. The percentage of dissenters grows slowly with time. But it is still small, relatively. He has the reporters more with him than their publishers are. It is the reverse of the line-up under Coolidge, when the publishers were generally supporting him and their correspondents at Washington had their tongues in their cheeks. Newspaper men in Washington are increasingly dubious about many of the policies of the Roosevelt administration, but this has reacted almost none at all on his own popularity with them. It is impossible to give accurate statistics, but the situation may be roughly suggested by saying that if the reporters are 60 percent for the new deal they are close to 90 percent for Mr. Roosevelt, personally.

Almost everyone regards him as an exceptionally skillful politician, with a sure instinct for the right note and, equally important, for accurate timing. When a group of Democrats in Congress, with more zeal than judgment, decided to parade to the railroad station with a brass band and welcome him back from his Florida vacation—an unprecedented thing, made somewhat ridiculous by the fact that the groveling legislators had overridden his veterans' veto and otherwise broken out of bounds when he went away—Mr. Roosevelt extricated himself by a little speech in which he good-humoredly showered the delegation with rhetorical razzberries.

Newspapermen are constantly amazed at his knowledge of administrative detail, as revealed in his off-hand answers to their questions at press conferences. Above all, they like his good-humored and smiling spirit, the mark of a man at peace with himself and at ease in his job. Occasionally there is a feeling that he is a little too blithe and casual—as when he annulled the air-mail contracts suddenly without a more thorough check with the Army before turning the task over to the Air Corps. The Chief of Staff, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, first heard that the Army would have to carry the mails when newspaper men raced across the street from the White House with the news. It had been discussed with some of his subordinates a short time before the announcement was made. That action and the much-debated spanking of Colonel Lindbergh are about the only two incidents in which Mr. Roosevelt's political judgment has been seriously questioned among Washington newspapermen—that is, as to technique, not as to the intrinsic merit of the policies involved.

In the judgment of this writer, there are at least five elements in this unusual popularity which President Rosevelt enjoys in the most critical circle at Washington.

First, the personal contacts between Mr. Roosevelt and the press are pleasant. He is on extremely intimate terms with the newspapermen who are regularly assigned full time to the White House. They are family guests at Sunday night suppers. On vacations and when he is traveling they are practically members of the family. He calls them all by their first names, knows their little jokes; and when one of them appears in the morning with a hangover, he is apt to ask for details. They play water polo with him. He has few secrets from them and often will discuss with them the most confidential policies in detail long before any publication is permitted.

Then for the vast group of correspondents who are not regularly assigned at the White House but who attend the semi-weekly press conferences, he also is pleasant. He is patient in answering their questions, never loses his temper, ducks delicate inquiries not by scowling in disapproval but with a wisecrack. Some of the best bon mots which circulate in Washington originate from the highest authority.

The second element in his popularity is that he never sends the reporters away empty-handed. They are always sure of plenty of news from Mr. Roosevelt's press conference. Usually a new President draws a large attendance. Then, as one conference after another produces no news, the reporters come to consider the regular White House interview a waste of time and attendance dwindles to a handful. But in this administration the number seems to grow rather than diminish. So reporters, thinking back upon past Presidents who were grumpy and had no news, are ready to cheer for one who can give them several laughs and a couple of top-head dispatches in a 20-minute visit.

At his first press conference Mr. Roosevelt announced abolition of the written question and said he would rather have the reporters shoot at him orally. Many doubted whether he could keep this up. The written question was adopted after Warren Harding almost upset the Washington Arms Conference by the wrong answer to a newspaper man's question about the Pacific four-power pact. He had to issue a written statement acknowledging his error. It was so humiliating that Mr. Harding decided that all questions thereafter should be submitted in writing, so that he might have time to ponder each query and confer with advisers if necessary to be sure of the correct answer. The same system was continued under Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Hoover. But toward the end of the Hoover administration fewer and fewer of these written questions were answered. Reporters practically quit offering them, and during the last 6 months of that administration the press conferences were held only at rare intervals.

Mr. Roosevelt threw the press conference wide open. No questions are barred. In the average session 20 or 30 questions will be asked—about Japan, war debts, the housing program, silver, tariff, liquor, whether a Cabinet officer is about to resign, literally any subject that pops up in a reporter's fertile mind. Sometimes the President will merely smile and say, "I will consider that question was not asked." More often he will duck by saying, "Let's wait until the next conference on that; maybe I'll be able to talk to you then." Or he will reply, "I don't know a thing about that, Fred; I wonder if you have it confused with something else which I will describe in this way." Answering another question, he will say, "I can give you a good tip on that if you don't say that I said it." Or he will explain a complicated question in great detail as a guide to the reporters. Again he will discuss a situation on the understanding that nothing will be printed at all—his purpose being to give the reporter a glimpse into the Presidential mind so that he will not jump to erroneous conclusions.

But most of the time what President Roosevelt says can be outlined as coming from him, though actual quotation marks are not to be used unless specifically authorized—the purpose here being to assume full responsibility for what is said but not for the exact language uttered offhand.

The system is accepted as fair to the President, to the press, and to the public; and no serious violations of confidence or other complications have resulted. Over more than a year it has been demonstrated that the President can talk to 200 men twice a week as frankly as he chooses, with complete assurance that what he says will be reported accurately and his confidences protected.

This open-door policy has been instituted throughout the Government departments generally. Cabinet officers and emergency executives like General Johnson and Harry Hopkins talk freely and endeavor to keep news writers fully and accurately informed. Performance is not 100 percent. General Johnson has of late been seeing the press only at long intervals. But, on the whole, the White House example is followed throughout the Government, and it is recognized that this is due largely to the President's desire that it should be that way.

In addition there is the elaborate set-up of Government publicity representatives or press contact men. Beginning with Stephen T. Early at the White House and running through practically every department and agency of the Government, these press contact men function to aid reporters. All of them are former newspapermen and most have records as excellent reporters. While they are sometimes inclined to put the best foot forward, they are energetic in assisting newspapermen. They will dig out information and arrange for a reporter to see the top man or any other official. They serve as ready-reference contacts for routine inquiries and in that way are timesavers. Though not above a little propagandizing now and then, for the most part they cultivate good will by rendering service. They have had enough experience in the newspaper business to know that a little propaganda goes a long way and that it is apt to curdle good will among reporters, and in the long run do more damage than good.

All this leaves most newspapermen with a feeling that the administration from President Roosevelt down has little to conceal and is willing to do business with the doors open. This makes the newspaperman's work infinitely easier and more effective; and since he remembers how hard the going was under some previous administrations he likes the new deal much better.

Third in the writer's list of reasons for the personal popularity of the President among newspapermen is their admiration for his political craftsmanship. This is the same sort of respect that accrues to a star in any activity. It is like the admiration for Babe Ruth, for Man o' War, for a skillful surgeon, a great artist, in short, for a man who knows how to do his stuff. After having seen the ball fumbled so often at the White House, reporters found themselves wide-eyed with astonishment at a man who could close every bank in the country and call it a "holiday", who pocketed the dangerous greenback drive during his first 8 months in office by inducing Congress to give him discretionary power to issue paper money which in his discretion he refused to issue, who was always ready with a new rabbit to pull out of the hat when the audience began to grow restless.

Similarly they note his skill in beating the critics of C.W.A. to the draw by disclosing its failure first and his art of restraint in not overdoing his powerful radio appeals. All of this expertness has added to his reputation among newspapermen as a political craftsman.

Fourth, and much more fundamental, is a belief in his sincerity, his courage, his willingness to experiment. Often skill in politics connotes lack of sincerity. In Roosevelt it is regarded by his indulgent critics as technique, a method of reaching an end. To those who have heard him time after time discuss his objectives, there is little doubt that he is seeking to move—as his campaign speeches indicated—toward a civilization in which the fruits of industry will be more equitably distributed among the people. Much of what he said during his campaign for the Presidency sounded like the usual pre-election hokum, but his actions since inauguration have convinced most newspapermen that he is shooting for the goals to which he pointed.

Though many newspapermen do not agree with those objectives, almost all of them respect the courage which he displays in striving for them. This is especially so because politicians are notoriously timid. A man who is able, without batting an eye, to launch N.R.A., A.A.A., a $3,300,000,000 Public Works program, the Civilian Conservation Corps program, slam the banks shut, go off the gold standard, revalue the dollar, take on every sort of discretionary power instead of trying to shoulder off on Congress a share of the responsibility, was bound to register with a corps of newspapermen who were weary of trimmers, pussyfooters, and people who had not given them a new idea to write about since the World War. Al Smith was the newspaperman's hero in his day because of his courage and his sincerity. Those traits, so rare in politics, are certain to go a long way whenever newspapermen size up a public figure. This does not mean that a man has to be a fanatic or a blind zealot. Newspapermen know enough of practical politics to realize that the man who wants to get his ideas into operation must use political machinery for his purposes. Wilson lost because he neglected this. A large number of instances could be mentioned in which holders of lesser office came to grief in the same way.

Fifth, and last among our reasons, Mr. Roosevelt rode into office on a plea for the "forgotten man", and newspaper reporters are inclined to consider themselves among under-dog men. This ingredient in Mr. Roosevelt's popularity clicks with many Washington reporters just as it does with other toilers. Newspapermen are inclined to have an idealistic streak. In their work they see much sham and injustice. They see many getting away with much at the expense of others. So they are exceptionally susceptible to the appeal of the man who champions the under dog—provided he is sincere. For this reason the man most respected in Congress probably is Senator GEORGE NORRIS. The same was true of the late Senator La Follette.

During the formulation of the newspaper code many reporters were among themselves derisive of the fight which their employers made over the freedom of the press. They regarded it as a red herring thrown across the trail by publishers who wished to escape higher wages and shorter hours for their editorial forces under N.R.A. Scarcely any working newspapermen in Washington seriously thought that the administration was bent on limiting the freedom of the press. They regarded the whole issue as a cloud of dust raised to screen the fight against child-labor restrictions and other N.R.A. regulations. Many reporters thought that General Johnson made a tactical error and played into the hands of the publishers by resisting a freedom-of-the-press declaration, and thereby gave an appearance of color to the very contention of the publishers. They liked better President Roosevelt's method of accepting the freedom-of-the-press section with the remark that it was just like copying a clause of the Constitution into the code, but that if it made anybody feel better to repeat what the Constitution guaranteed, no harm could come from doing it.

As employees the Washington newspapermen have an emotional interest in the new deal, for they have rent to pay, babies to feed, groceries to buy, and they see all around them men of inferior ability making a more comfortable living. They are not so much interested in shorter hours, because most newspapermen work with little regard for the clock. They would like greater reward for the thought, the energy, the loyalty, and the complete absorption which they give to their work.

Furthermore, most of them are college-educated. They have studied and read enough, and heard enough in Senate investigations, to convince them that there are many grave abuses that need to be cleaned out. They believe Mr. Roosevelt is set on cleaning them out. So this portion of the newspaper corps is for him because of subjective reasons.

That, in general, is about the way the boys in the pressroom feel about it, and why.

ADDRESS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL AT DEDICATION OF NEW POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT BUILDING

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I present an address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, the Postmaster General, upon the occasion of the dedication of the new Post Office Department Building, at Washington, D.C., on Monday, June 11, 1934, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Members of Congress, distinguished guests, fellow Government workers, ladies, and gentlemen, we are assembled today to dedicate the new home and headquarters of the United States Post Office Department. It was just 134 years ago today—on June 11, 1800—that the Department first opened its doors in the city of Washington. We are happy to have you join with us in the dedication of this magnificent building, a building worthy of our great Republic.

Those of us in the Post Office Department are particularly honored to have on our dedication program Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, President pro tempore of the United States Senate; Speaker HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, of the House of Representatives; Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and Congressman JAMES M. MEAD, Chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Upon this occasion I take the opportunity to acknowledge the splendid services which Senator MCKELLAR and Congressman MEAD have rendered the Post Office Department and the Postal Service of the United States.

We are also honored to have on this program Mr. Everett Marshall, the famous baritone, whose presence here has been made possible through the courtesy of Loew's Theaters.

Two noted bishops, Bishop William F. McDowell, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and Bishop James H. Ryan, rector of the Catholic University of America, have, by their presence and participation, added a special distinction to the dedication exercises.

We are also grateful for the participation of the United States Marine Band, the Columbia Mixed Quartet, and Mr. Earl Carbauh, the well-known baritone soloist.

Words can but inadequately express the gratitude we feel toward those whose foresight developed this wonderful Capital City, founded by the immortal Washington himself, and bearing his honored name. Our generation is doing its part in carrying out the plans of making it the most beautiful of cities—a city which, we believe, will remain sacred to his memory and his ideals until time shall be no more.

But we must remember that outward ceremonials and the words we speak on such an occasion as this are but as sounding brass if they do not spring warm from the heart and reecho the profound sentiments of patriotism and devotion which lie too deep for words.

They are as nothing if we do not translate them into actions. When our career is over let it be truly said that we faithfully endeavored to serve the best interests of our country.

The story of the Post Office Department is the story of the development of the trade and commerce and the social and spiritual life of our country.

It is well on such an occasion to let our minds revert to our simple beginnings and learn again the lessons of wise frugality, devotion to duty, and the persevering faith of those whose work has culminated in the great postal establishment we have today.

Post offices may trace their beginnings to the early English taverns where horse relays were made by the King's messengers. When people began to leave their letters at the relay stations for delivery by the post riders, that part of the tavern devoted to their care became the post office, and the tavern keeper became the postmaster.

Elder Brewster kept such a tavern and was postmaster at Scrooby, England, before he led the Puritan migration into Holland, and afterward, in 1620, to Plymouth, Mass., in the Mayflower.

The development of the Postal Service in America to the time of the Revolution was of a slow but steady growth, which was greatly accelerated when Benjamin Franklin become postmaster at Philadelphia in 1737, with the additional authority to supervise the several other post offices. A historian in the 1750's stated that the headquarters of the Postal Service in North America was designated as New York in 1710, by that "by connivance the Postmaster General resides anywhere, at present in Virginia." The central offices of the postal establishment have been moved many times.

In 1753 the Service was divided, with headquarters in Charleston, S.C., and Philadelphia, Pa. This continued until the Revolution.

On July 26, 1775, the Continental Congress unanimously chose Franklin as Postmaster General and designated his headquarters as Philadelphia. It is believed that he used his home at the corner of Second and Race Streets for his office as Postmaster General. His salary was $1,000 a year with an allowance of $340 for a secretary. It is probable his son-in-law, Richard Bache, who succeeded him November 7, 1776, retained the same headquarters.

Ebenezer Hazard, the last Postmaster General under the Continental Congress, and who succeeded Bache on January 28, 1782, was a former assistant to Franklin. He established the headquarters of the Post Office Department at New York, where he had been postmaster.

Postmaster General Osgood, the first Postmaster General under the Constitution, had his headquarters in a room in connection with the city post office in New York, then located in what was officially described as "the uppermost of two houses on Broadway opposite Beaver Street."

During the latter part of his administration, late in 1790, the Department moved to Philadelphia and headquarters were established on the east side of Water Street a few doors below High Street.

Mr. Osgood's successor, Timothy Pickering, wrote Alexander Hamilton that he had found a house in Philadelphia that would accommodate his family and give him office room. He said he would need the same force as his predecessor, namely, an assistant and a clerk. He stated also that for the two rooms for the Post Office Department and a cellar for wood, and including janitor service, he might make a charge of $300 a year.

Hamilton, as Secretary of the Treasury, approved and wrote him there was nothing in his proposal "but what appears consistent with the interests of the United States." This place was located at the northeast corner of Fifth and Chestnut Streets.

As nearly as can be determined, it was from here the Post Office Department moved to Washington, arriving May 30, 1800, with its force of nine people, including the Postmaster General.

Abraham Bradley, First Assistant Postmaster General, wrote on June 11, 1800, just 134 years ago today, that he had not been able to open the office until that date. He expressed the opinion that Washington would probably become the greatest city in America.

The Post Office Department was first established at the corner of Ninth and E Streets NW., in what Mr. Bradley described as a large 3-story house which would accommodate the Post Office Department offices, his family, and the post office.

Some time in 1801 it was moved to what was then known as "the Southwest Executive Office" on Seventeenth Street, between F and G. This building of 25 rooms was occupied by the Post Office, War, Navy, and State Departments.

In 1810 the Post Office Department and post office were again moved to the north side of E Street, between Seventh and Eighth, to a building known as "Blodgett's Hotel." It was burned in 1836 with a loss of many departmental records.

In the emergency Postmaster General Kendall rented Fullers Hotel, now the site of the Willard.

A new Post Office Department building was then erected at Seventh and E Streets, which still stands. This building, a beautiful specimen of white marble architecture, was occupied by the Post Office Department from 1841 until 1899. It was begun in 1839 and completed portions were occupied in 1841. It was completed wholly in 1859 at a cost of $2,150,000.

The Post Office Department building from which we moved within the last few days was acquired under an act of Congress approved June 25, 1890. The building was started in February of 1892 and occupied in November 1899. The structure cost $2,585,835, and the ground $655,490.77. The smooth finish given the granite above the mezzanine floor cost $229,000 extra, making a total of nearly $3,500,000.

It has served its purpose well and it was with natural feelings of regret that it was vacated by us, especially those who associate it with cherished friendships and pleasant memories accumulated through the years.

The building we dedicate today, the latest of the many homes of the Post Office Department, was erected under acts of Congress approved May 25, 1926, and July 3, 1930. The land cost $2,500,872 and the building costs were $686,000 for the foundation and $7,642,000 for the building itself, a total of $10,828,872.

Ground was broken November 10, 1931, and the cornerstone laid September 26, 1932.

The architects and contractors have completed their tasks in a most creditable manner. This structure will long remain a monument to their ability. We must not overlook the important part which the mechanics and laborers played in the erection of this building and the contribution made by the mechanics and laborers who fabricated the materials used in it.

To my loyal assistants and coworkers, the supervisors, clerks, messengers, laborers, and all, I express the hope they will always find within its walls the peace and happiness that come from work well done, and that they will always look upon it as a place of happy service amid pleasant surroundings.

I want them to know that I appreciate the fidelity and loyalty they have shown in carrying on their work during the trying times through which the country has passed.

We will continue our efforts to increase the efficiency of our service which we proudly look upon as the largest business operation in the world, employing as it does some 242,000 men and women and having cash revenues approximating $587,000,000.

Our Postal Savings deposits amount to one billion one hundred and ninety-nine millions, and last year we issued over 171,000,000 money orders amounting to $1,655,000,000.

During the same period we handled approximately 150,737,000 pieces of domestic, registered, insured, and c.o.d. mail. These are but a few of the activities of the Post Office Department.

We are endeavoring to give more and more service for less and less cost.

Already through wise legislation enacted by Congress and careful administration the gigantic postal deficit of $152,000,000 for the fiscal year 1932 was reduced to 48 millions by July 1, 1933. We hope to reduce it still further this fiscal year and possibly eliminate it altogether.

In the meantime the Department's policy will continue to be to extend and improve the service; eliminate all waste and extravagance; see that no special privileges are granted; make working conditions, so far as possible, the best in the country; and require that integrity and ability be the first requirements in the selection of all public servants. In this I ask the aid of all officers and employees and the support of all citizens.

In dedicating this building let us also dedicate ourselves to the high purposes of government and the exalted patriotism exemplified by our great President, whose faith in our institutions has never faltered, whose wise and courageous leadership has carried us from the depths to the heights from which we can see the dawn of a new day.

I want to thank each of you for your participation in these exercises. You have assisted in the dedication of a building which stands as a permanent monument to the Government for which your fathers and mothers worked, prayed, and sacrificed. Let us give the same devotion and loyalty to our Government, to the end that it may better contribute to the welfare of all our people and that an end may once and for all be put to governmental favoritism to special interests and special classes.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—PORTER BROTHERS & BIFFLE AND OTHER CITIZENS

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the bill (S. 2880) for the relief of Porter Brothers & Biffle and certain other citizens (73d Cong., 2d sess.) is a claims bill introduced by me. The bill has passed the Senate and House. I ask unanimous consent that the papers relating to the bill may be released from the possession of the Committee on Claims for the benefit of attorneys representing the claimant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONERGAN in the chair), laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations in the Post Office Department, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, reported favorably the nomination of Rexford Guy Tugwell, of New York, to be Under Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the calendar.

THE CALENDAR

TREATIES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar is in order.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read Executive D, Seventy-third Congress, second session, a treaty of friendship, commerce, and consular rights between the United States and the Republic of Finland, signed at Washington, February 13, 1934.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the treaties be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the treaties will be passed over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Arkansas in this connection that inquiry has been made of me frequently as to when it is intended to give consideration to the treaties.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I hope that may be done within the next two days. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is here. I have discussed the matter with him, and it is understood that at the first opportunity the Senate will be asked to consider the treaties.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Carlisle W. Higgins to be United States attorney for the middle district of North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the nomination be confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George Philip to be United States attorney for the district of South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles W. Robertson to be United States marshal for the district of South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Clyde L. Seavey, of California, to be a member of the Federal Power Commission for the remainder of the term expiring June 22, 1935.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

BOARD OF TAX APPEALS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles P. Smith, of Massachusetts, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for the term of 12 years from June 2, 1934.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of J. Russell Leech, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for the term of 12 years from June 2, 1934.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Bolon B. Turner, of Arkansas, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals for the term of 12 years from June 2, 1934.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles J. Baker to be collector of customs, customs collection district no. 16, Charleston, S.C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 13, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 12, 1934

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for Him who took little children in His arms and loved them until they smiled out loud. In the light of His teaching may we understand that we are not in the world to inherit, but we are here to be benefactors of our fellow men. May the divine spirit grip us to the farthest limits of our souls. Thou hast told us that all the commandments are packed into one: Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy mind, with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and thy neighbor as thyself. Almighty God, get to the human conscience that a man is a man's equal anywhere on the planet and has a birthright to heaven and eternity. Oh, the tragedies of the world—the crash of arms, the black nights that never come to morning, and the helpless cries that never come to a human ear. Lord God of Hosts be with us yet lest we forget, lest we forget. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 265

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. THOMAS C. COFFIN, late a Representative from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3025) entitled "An act to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act so as to extend for 1 year the temporary plan for deposit insurance, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 9745. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE TOM C. COFFIN

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 4 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last I was called from the Chamber just before the announcement was made of the untimely death of TOM C. COFFIN, but I cannot permit this opportunity to pass without paying my humble tribute to a good and noble soul.

I should be remiss in the obligation that a long and tried friendship imposes if I did not by some simple word commemorate his passing.

It was one of the grisly jests of life that made it possible for him who had challenged death in death's own domain above the clouds to meet the Grim Reaper on the peaceful streets of his own Nation's Capital.

> Oh, what is life's beacon and what is the goal,
> That awaits at the end, save the immortal soul
> May be purged of its dross and be fitted to gain
> The reward of a life that has earned it in pain?

TOM COFFIN has gone from among us. He has stepped out into that starless, silent, unknown realm, where intelligence may not enter, and where faith alone may pilot.

He so lived his life that the world is better and brighter and happier because he has lived, and these old gray walls are grayer and sadder because he has gone.

Oh, words are a weak vehicle to express the thought; but in after years, when others shall come along the road he trod and see the flowers blooming planted by his hands, they shall counsel and speak among themselves and say, "Down this way a gentleman has gone." [Applause.]

PROCEEDINGS AT UNVEILING OF STATUE OF WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 43

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed with illustrations, in such form and style as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, 5,000 copies of the proceedings held in connection with the unveiling of the statue of William Jennings Bryan, in Washington, D.C., May 3, 1934, together with such other matter as may be relevant thereto, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,100 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 900 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Nebraska.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer and shall procure suitable illustrations to be published with these proceedings.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBETH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is that a usual resolution, passed when a statue is dedicated here in Washington given by private subscription?

Mr. LAMBETH. There are precedents for this resolution. In the case of the statue of John Ericsson in Potomac Park it was done. Further, we have reduced the number to one-third of the former number. It will cost only about $200, according to the estimate of the Public Printer.

Mr. SNELL. The entire expense will be only $200?

Mr. LAMBETH. Two hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-eight cents, to be exact.

Mr. SNELL. I have never happened to have my attention called to a resolution of this character, but I shall take the gentleman's word for it that it has been done before.

Mr. LAMBETH. We have investigated it, and it has been done in the past.

Mr. SNELL. It is peculiar, and I think somewhat surprising, that we have to pay the expenses for the dedication of a private statue.

Mr. LAMBETH. But we are not paying the expenses for the dedication.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS AT ACCEPTANCE OF THE STATUES OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AND ROBERT E. LEE

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I present another privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 45

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed, with illustrations, in such form and style as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, 7,000 copies of the proceedings in Congress together with the proceedings held in the rotunda of the Capitol, and such other matter as may be relevant thereto, upon the acceptance of the statues of George Washington and Robert E. Lee, presented by the State of Virginia, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,300 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 3,700 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Virginia.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer and shall procure suitable illustrations to be published with these proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The title of the resolution was amended to read:

To print the proceedings in Congress and in Statuary Hall upon the acceptance in the rotunda of the Capitol of the statues of George Washington and Robert E. Lee, presented by the State of Virginia.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 4 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman has a request for a roll call on the point of no quorum made last night. Is not that the first business this morning?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to renew that. The vote is de novo.

Mr. BLANTON. And the presumption is that there is a quorum present at this time.

The SPEAKER. That is the presumption. Is there objection?

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is going to call for a roll call on this bill, I object. If he is not going to call for a roll call, I shall not object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of expedition, we have other very important matters that we desire to call up, and I think the gentleman from Arkansas ought not to object, and should let the gentleman from Ohio proceed for 4 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman and I talked about this. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will not object.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there has been some understanding about it, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to talk about the bill (H.R. 9178) to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia, now before the House. If after I have done so, gentlemen want to vote for this bill without further explanation and do not want a roll call, I do not propose to ask for one, because I shall be putting myself on record as opposed to it. Someone has said that the District of Columbia is a dumping ground for worthless insurance policies. Pass this bill and it may and probably will become the dumping ground for worthless life-insurance securities. I call attention on page 28 of the bill to the language beginning in line 19, which reads as follows:

> If purchased at par, at the par value; if purchased above or below par, on the basis of the purchase price adjusted so as to bring the value to par at maturity and so as to yield meantime the effective rate of interest at which the purchase was made: Provided, That the purchase price shall in no case be taken at a higher figure than the actual market value at the time of purchase: Provided further, That the Superintendent shall have full discretion in determining the method of calculating values according to the foregoing rule, and the values found by him in accordance with such method shall be final and binding.

In other words, you empower one man to take any bond that today is worth only 30 percent of par and place it on the books at par, to draw interest on that basis. You give the insurance commissioner full power to set the prices on all securities that the companies hold now instead of his taking them at their true market values. How many millions of dollars have depositors in closed banks been defrauded of by this very method? How many millions of people today are down on their knees destitute and in want because their life's savings have been legally stolen from them by just such a method as you propose to enact into law in this bill? There have been many scandals about life-insurance companies and policies in the District of Columbia. Here you propose to pass, without debate, without anybody being able to read it this bill, and clothe one man with this great authority. No matter how honest he may be, the opportunities are too great and the temptations are too great to take many worthless securities held by insolvent insurance companies and make them par value and thus place these insolvent insurance companies in a position to defraud further the policyholders of this District and to defraud further their investors.

Then, section 4 proposes to give to the superintendent of insurance full powers to regulate and make refunds to companies or to offset on their current year's fees any overcharge in taxes or fees which the insurance commissioner may determine should be offset. I call attention to the fact that this very same practice with regard to refunding and making offsets on income taxes in our country has nearly drained the Treasury and it has cost the taxpayers of this country $5,000,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 4 minutes to reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I have no fear that the gentleman's speech will have anything to do with killing this bill, but I do not want such an impression as he advocates to go out over the country. Those who are familiar with the insurance business know that the fact we have had no code in Washington during all these years has been a joke all over this Nation. It has been looked upon by insurance companies and by insurance commissioners of other States as a joke. The insurance commissioner of Washington goes to the national conventions with other insurance commissioners of the Nation; and while he has a voice, he is looked upon less than the delegates from the Philippines and Puerto Rico. The very reason which the gentleman from Ohio suggests for his opposition to this bill is the very reason why this bill should be adopted. This act has been studied year in and year out. It has been passed upon favorably by the committees of the House. It has been brought here and finally failed to pass because no one took any interest in it. Now, in the interest of the people of the District of Columbia it is our intention to drive out the get-rich-quick and bankrupt concerns engaged in insurance. This has been a fertile field for get-rich-quick companies.

It is rather surprising that we have to sit here day in and day out and listen to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX], who seeks to be bigger than the committees, who seeks to be bigger than this House, and who seeks to fight and defeat every measure, although——

Mr. TRUAX. That is an untrue statement.

Mr. FULLER. Although when it comes to a test in the House, as it was yesterday, he opposes all the rest of this House, and was the only man who stood up in opposition to this bill.

Mr. TRUAX. I was the only man who read the bill. Your committee cannot gag me.

Mr. FULLER. According to the gentleman's big ideas, it is "big I" and "little you" whenever the gentleman from Ohio wants to speak in this House.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman could apply that to himself as well, and much better than to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FULLER. The very fact that he espouses a measure or the very fact that he is opposed to a measure is a self-evident fact that it will only receive 1 or 2 votes in the entire House.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I demand that those words be taken down. I will put my record with that of the gentleman from Arkansas any time any place. I demand that those words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The words will be taken down. The Clerk will read the words taken down.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The very fact that he espouses a measure or the very fact that he is opposed to a measure is a self-evident fact that it will only receive 1 or 2 votes in the entire House.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I brand that statement as a plain and deliberate falsehood.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that nothing is in order.

Mr. TRUAX. I rise to a point of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the words:

> The very fact that he espouses a measure or the very fact that he is opposed to a measure is a self-evident fact that it will only receive 1 or 2 votes in the entire House.

The Chair thinks that is a matter of judgment. The gentleman from Arkansas may be wrong in his conclusions and in his judgment, but the House knows whether it is true or not. The RECORD will show whether it is true or not.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I say that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] uttered a deliberate falsehood in those words, and the RECORD will prove it. I rise to a point of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The words do not imply that at all. The Chair holds that the words are in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Regular order is demanded.

S. 2347, TO MAKE THE PROVISIONS OF THE INLAND WATERWAYS ACT APPLICABLE TO THE COLUMBIA AND SNAKE RIVERS

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present during the consideration of the bill S. 2347. I was paired on the bill. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, 2 weeks ago we listened to a simple yet eloquent plea by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] in behalf of a national park for the Everglades, Fla.

I am in entire sympathy with the plan of providing a sanctuary for our feathered friends and other wild animals, to preserve our fauna and flora in their natural beauty, and to preserve playgrounds for our people. In the open spaces of the far West we have many such parks and playgrounds. The gentleman evidently is a student and lover of nature—but has not yet heard the "call of the West." More than a score of years ago I yielded to that call and left my native prairies of Illinois for the rugged West where nature has been so bountiful—where, as it were, you are face to face with God. Let me quote from the grandest of poems by the greatest of poets—Thanatopsis, by William Cullen Bryant:

> The hills rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun,
> The vales stretching in pensive quietness between;
> The venerable woods—rivers that move in majesty
> And the complaining brooks that make the meadows green;
> And, poured round all Old Ocean's gray and melancholy waste
> Are but the solemn decorations all of the great tomb of man.

Majestic mountains! First to be kissed by early dawn and morning breezes. Snow-capped peaks glistening at glorious sunrise and glowing at flaming sunset! Magnificent valleys that only the ages can fashion. Forests primeval! Where you stand with bowed head in awe and silence to repeat the couplet by Joyce Kilmer:

> Poems are made by fools like me,
> But only God can make a tree.

I would paraphrase that thus:

> Speeches are made by fools like me.
> But only God can make a tree."

Noble rivers! Crystal clear and sparkling, and sunshine and shadow. Again I invite my friends and colleagues to come "out where the West begins"; where the climate is cool, refreshing, exhilirating; where the skies are as blue and clear as those of sunny Italy and storied Greece.

But we are not only dreamers but also a practical people. More than a hundred years ago Bryant wrote:

> Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound,
> Save his own dashings—yet the dead are there;
> And millions in those solitudes, since first
> The flight of years began, have laid them down
> In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone.

He had in his poetic mind the aborigines, the Indians in their last long sleep on the banks of the surging river.

Then came Gray—that intrepid Boston captain—to lay the foundation for our claim to this great Northwest and to rechristen the stream after his own good ship, the Columbia.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century the first great practical dreamer was placed in the White House. He had the vision of a mighty country extending from the stormy Atlantic to the placid Pacific. He had the courage to take the first step to make that dream come true by sending Lewis and Clark on their memorable expedition, up the Mississippi and Missouri, over the stony mountains and down the Snake and Columbia to the mighty Pacific. What a glorious adventure, and fraught with what importance to coming generations!

Following them came the patient, determined missionaries—the Whitmans, the Spauldings, the Jason Lees. What heroic souls! With them the pioneers! The pioneers! No descriptive adjectives are necessary. Their courage, their sufferings, their very lives, speak volumes. Go out into the corridors east of the House Chamber and gallery and see them painted. "Westward the course of empire takes its way." On their faces are pictured hope, courage, intelligence, and determination.

And now we have a second great practical dreamer in the White House.

The construction of Boulder Dam, it is true, was begun years ago. But the President is going to make this a blessing to all the people of the great Southwest instead of the private plaything of a select few. He has carried to a glorious fruition the splendid dream of Senator NORRIS, and now Muscle Shoals and the T.V.A. have become the national yardstick to bless not only the people of the great Southeast but also all the United State. Temporarily he has been checked in the St. Lawrence Valley, but time and the will of the common people will compel the construction of this great project for the benefit of the teeming millions in our great Northeast.

But I am indeed particularly proud and pleased to call to the attention of the Members of this House our own project of the great Northwest. The extensive Columbia Basin, with its tributaries and valleys, will have a tremendous significance for the generations to come. Sooner or later the coal, the oil, the minerals will be exhausted—will be removed from the bowels of old mother earth. But the magic touch of the modern "white coal"—the exhaustless water power of the ponderous glaciers and the rushing waterfalls—will be within the grasp of the new electric age and go on forever. In our State of Washington alone, we have one-sixth of the potential water power of the whole United States. One-sixth! Will we be worthy sons and daughters of our worthy pioneer forebears and develop and direct this wonderful gift of nature for the common good? God grant us the vision, the determination, the courage so to do!

When this is fully developed, when this wild and tempestuous horsepower has been harnessed, we will hear the whir of millions of factory wheels, we will see hundreds of thousands of happy laborers employed and a mighty industrial empire rise in the great Northwest to rival ancient Babylon or modern England. We have already made a beginning at Bonneville and Coulee Dams, but this is merely a beginning.

The Snake and all the tributaries to the great Columbia must also be harnessed. When these waters are impounded and controlled, they will serve as a means of cheap transportation for the manifold products of our great inland empire. Nature and nature's God has been bountiful to us in wonderful natural resources—minerals and products of the soil. Marble and minerals, fruit and wheat—even now the people of the hinterland in Idaho and Oregon and Washington are pleading for reasonable transportation charges, while the people of the coast cities and of the Orient are clamoring for these products. That is why we, representing these sections of these States, are appealing to the Federal Government to have foresight and to look to the future and construct locks at Bonneville for ocean-going vessels. We must build for the future, not just for the present.

Again, these waters will eventually be used to irrigate millions of acres now a waste, and with the aid of life-giving water will be made to blossom like a rose and to furnish happy homes for millions of contented farmers. Right here may I express the firm conviction that there is no such a thing as overproduction; no, not as long as there are starving children and ragged fathers and hopeless mothers.

Rather it is underconsumption, and God grant we may solve this problem by furnishing cheap power for every use in home and industry, cheap transportation by land and water, and a common-sense marketing system that will close the wide gap between producer and consumer. Restore the purchasing power of the two great producing groups—the farmers and laborers, and give them the means wherewith to enjoy the bounties of nature and the intelligence and industry of man, and our recovery will not only be certain but also permanent.

As a necessary step in this direction, the inclusion and development of the Columbia and Snake with the Mississippi are imperative. I plead with you to forget sections. There is no East, no West, no North, no South. Our great leader has started a program of national development that will redound to the credit of all who take part and to benefit and comfort countless millions to come. Posterity will rise up to praise and bless such foresight.

LIFE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I think something ought to be said about the remarks that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] made against the code, not that it makes any difference.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. Regular order is demanded.

The unfinished business before the House is on the question of agreeing to the amendment to the bill (H.R. 9178) to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FULLER), there were—ayes 114, noes 1.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL HOUSING, EMPLOYMENT, AND INSURANCE

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged report (No. 1951) from the Committee on Rules for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 434

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9620, a bill to improve Nation-wide housing standards, provide employment, and stimulate industry; to improve conditions with respect to home-mortgage financing; to prevent speculative excesses in new-mortgage investment, and to eliminate the necessity for costly second-mortgage financing, by creating a system of mutual mortgage insurance and by making provision for the organization of additional institutions to handle home financing; to promote thrift and protect savings; to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act; to amend the Federal Reserve Act; and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order the substitute amendment and any other amendments recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I shall make a very brief statement in connection with this resolution.

I think it is pretty generally understood that this is one bill that the administration and those who are in favor of the principle of this bill are very much interested in putting upon its immediate passage. This bill, of course, is the one that has been under consideration by the Committee on Banking and Currency for a number of days, and is commonly called the "housing bill." I am not familiar with the details of the bill, because, like many others, I have not had the time or the opportunity to give it any consideration. But, admittedly, it is a measure in which the administration is tremendously interested and in which I think the country is tremendously interested.

This resolution now presented from the Committee on Rules provides for 3 hours of general debate upon the merits of the bill to be equally controlled by the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member. It was arranged that time would be provided for those who might desire to oppose the provisions of the bill. Taking into consideration the hour allowed under the rule, and 3 hours of general debate, we will have a total of 4 hours of debate upon the bill. I regret that it could not be shortened, because I am one of those who are very anxious to conclude the essential legislation now pending before Congress and adjourn sine die. [Applause.]

The rule provides that all points of order against the bill shall be waived; that the House substitute, for purposes of amendment, may be considered as an original bill; that all germane amendments may be offered to the bill; and, of course, it provides for the usual motion to recommit.

I think this is all I desire to state in connection with the rule; and I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the usual 30 minutes if he desires it, receiving the rest of my time.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Is the bill to be read under the 5-minute rule?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes; it is an open rule in all respects.

Mr. MOTT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I voted to report a rule for the consideration of this bill very reluctantly, because, as I understand it, the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency is not the bill which is desired by the administration. It has been so changed in that committee that it is not in accordance with the purposes the administration had in view to meet this distressing situation as to housing.

I think it is important for the House, irrespective of the approach of adjournment—and, of course, I am not so optimistic about adjournment as some people are; I cannot see it in sight—to carefully consider this bill. The Committee on Banking and Currency, as I have been given to understand, has changed at least two important features of the bill by omitting these provisions from the bill as forwarded to that committee by the administration.

This bill was intended to take care of low-cost housing, or slum clearance. You will recall that under the Public Works Administration the matter of slum clearance was supposed to be financed; that body was supposed to make loans for low-cost housing, or slum clearance. The conduct of that bureau by P.W.A. has been a complete failure. Instead of helping slum clearance, that bureau has been definitely against housing projects—in our big cities at least—and especially if certain people were willing to do the building. You have read in the newspapers that millions have been allotted by the housing bureau of P.W.A. for slum-clearance projects. The millions have been allotted, but in most instances the real money has never been paid out. It has all been a publicity bluff. There was established a bureau under P.W.A. which has not been in sympathy with slum clearance in our cities, and under the leadership of Mr. Kohn, of New York, its chief, who has no sympathy with slum clearance, they switched from slum clearance to homesteads, which are built in the country, not the cities.

The President and the other heads of our departments of the administration, realizing that complete failure, included in this bill provision that low-cost housing and slum clearance should be taken care of by insuring the mortgages issued thereon.

The metropolitan centers and the smaller cities of this country with their problem of congested population surely have some right to be considered under this great program of the Federal Government lending billions of dollars to work us out of our difficulties.

I know this House does not subscribe to the statement that I understand was made in the Banking and Currency Committee that the only thing worth while helping was a one-story bungalow. We in the cities cannot house our people in one-story bungalows. We must build multiple dwellings; we must go up 8 or 10 stories because of the limited space and the cost of the ground. This was one of the definite programs of the administration, and it has been completely eliminated in the Banking and Currency Committee on the initiative of some members of that committee and against the wishes of the administration. I say it is not fair to the cities of this country to eliminate that feature pertaining to low-cost housing.

There is another important feature of this bill upon which I desire to comment. The Banking and Currency Committee have deliberately eliminated the establishment of national mortgage associations, as recommended by the administration. This whole title II has been taken bodily out of the bill as it is reported to the House. The bill reported to this House is not the bill which we were supposed to consider, and that is why I hesitated to vote for the rule.

You are going to be told, even by some of the leaders here, "Well, let us pass it through the House, as the committee has amended it. Let us not try to amend the bill on the floor of the House. The defects will be taken care of in conference or on the other side of the Capitol." We have heard this alibi before. We know how well the stock exchange bill was taken care of in conference. We know what happened when this House voted overwhelmingly that the administration of the Stock Exchange Act was to be placed in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission, instead of a new commission.

We know what happened when this House voted overwhelmingly that the administration of the Stock Exchange Act was to be placed in the Federal Trade Commission, and when we were told on the floor by the Chairman and others of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee that to have a separate commission was the thought, the creature, and the plot of the stock exchange itself. Our managers went into conference and brought back the exchange "pet" and "plot", which to a great extent will destroy the effectiveness of that bill.

That is what is going to happen here as to this bill, unless this House makes a fight on its own floor for amendments to restore to this bill very important measures recommended by the administration; for instance, putting in the bill a provision to take care of low-cost houses and slumming clearances [applause] and likewise restoring to the bill these national mortgage associations as provided in the original title II.

I know the plea which is going to be made on behalf of the building-and-loan associations to keep title II out. I am heartily in sympathy with building-and-loan associations.

I think they are one of the greatest institutions in America today, but they have already received hundreds of millions of dollars from the R.F.C. Even though we may be approaching the close of the session, which we are not, let us not just pass this worthless bill as the committee has amended it, hoping that another body will respect the administration wishes more than did the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. Let us not pass it, hoping that if the other body is in a hurry, too, the conferees will work it out satisfactorily. Surely, the conferees on the part of the House, who are responsible for these eliminations of the administration's provisions, will not put them back into the bill. Let us not be tricked or hoodwinked. We should enact the legislation which the administration wants, or no legislation at all.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If we desire to adopt the President's housing program, we will put back in the bill what the committee struck out?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; and I hope the House will do this by amendment before we are through and not be lulled to sleep by any suggestion that it can be taken care of on the other side of the Capitol.

The Senate bill still contains these provisions, which our own House committee has so unexplainedly eliminated. The Senate has not yet seen fit to eliminate these vital provisions, although the House committee has eliminated them and knows they will not be put back in conference, as far as the House conferees are concerned.

I submit this request to you with the greatest earnestness. Please do not be in a hurry to adjourn sine die. This is one of the most vital bills that has come before us in this session. It is one of the most vital projects of the administration, and we should stay here and try to amend this bill as it was originally intended and not trust to a conference which will give us the "foot", as they say, as happened in connection with the stock exchange bill.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Is there any reason why the gentleman cannot offer the amendment he proposes and why we cannot follow him?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have prepared the amendments, and I or members of the committee will offer the amendments. Here is the situation you will face. You will be told privately by the leadership, "Let us hurry up. The whole matter will be taken care of in conference." Do not believe it. It will not. We will get another stock-exchange sell-out.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman feel there is a necessity for putting back the provision for national mortgage associations?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I certainly do, and I hope the bill will not be signed by the President unless that provision is put back in.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this is an important bill. It provides for almost an unlimited amount of financing.

The bill in the first instance creates a structure which is intended to give aid in the rehabilitation of building operations in the United States, with the idea of stimulating return of employment. With that motive I am entirely in accord. The bill proposes to take $200,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States as its capital and authority is given for such additional funds from time to time as may be needed, and provides machinery for the creation of additional agencies. It authorizes the insurance of loans which are to be made through financial institutions, including banks, building-and-loan associations, and all such agencies that are under the supervision of the United States Government.

In Pennsylvania, California, and many of the States, there have been built up and developed great building-and-loan associations which have done more to aid and assist in the building of homes throughout the country than any one agency. With hardly any exception, these mutual building-and-loan associations have dealt with the public honestly, they have been honorably and properly managed and have rendered a great service. They are one of the greatest aids in this country to home ownership and to home building.

I listened to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] had to say with regard to putting into this bill that which he claims was taken out by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, section 2, which the House committee very properly struck out of this bill. May I say to the Membership of this House that if such authorization is put into this bill it will destroy the building-and-loan association business in the United States. If you want to do that now, put the provision back in the bill. Building-and-loan associations have dealt more fairly with their borrowers than any other class of financial institutions during the trying period of the past few years. Their foreclosures have been less than any other group.

I understand that section 3 of the bill has been eliminated from the bill by the Senate committee. This is as it should be.

Section 105 of this bill is an objectionable feature of the bill and should be stricken out. It, too, will have a tendency to destroy the building-and-loan business in the United States by bringing in a Government agency as a competitor financed with Government money.

The building-and-loan associations are owned cooperatively by the people who have borrowed from them for the purpose of building and sustaining their homes. Amortization payments are provided; a system of easy payments with reasonable interest rates is provided. No class of people in the United States is more deserving of support and no other class of people is less deserving of receiving the blow which would be administered by the Government's supporting an agency of this kind than these people.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I want to take just a moment of the gentleman's time and I believe the gentleman can secure more time if necessary.

I am just as much concerned about the building-and-loan business as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but there are two approaches to this question. The original bill provided that the Government should be in the direct lending business. This, of course, should be avoided if possible. The next proposal, however, which, as I understand it, is in this bill, simply provides for the setting up of a Federal association as a sort of rediscount organization to take over mortgages from private institutions, and with this distinction in mind I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he is opposed to the present provision of the bill which sets up these national mortgage associations but provides that they shall not compete directly with building-and-loan associations.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that my concern is for the building-and-loan associations, and it seems to me if we create a national institution, backed with Government credit, and permit it to deal in mortgages, we are going to destroy the building-and-loan-association business.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is interested, of course, in the improvement of the slum districts in the cities. I have no objection to this, but it is not a Federal affair—it is a city and State matter. I would call the attention of the gentleman from New York to what has been taking place in the city of New York, the kind of business that has been practiced by these large mortgage companies in New York that are now under examination by State authorities where they have misused their rights and have exploited the investors of the country by their speculations in real-estate mortgages in the cities. There are provisions in this bill which will, I am afraid, permit the refinancing of many such mortgages in this system and the real home owner may get the little end of this supposed relief.

I would be opposed to the Government's, in this particular bill, undertaking the refinancing of such mortgages now held by defunct agencies such as these in New York City, and that are held by many of the big insurance companies, or any refinancing of projects other than homes. I do not think the Government should go into the financing of business buildings or business blocks in the cities, but homes should be the thing for which the Government's money should be spent solely to promote the protection of homes and furnish employment and stimulate industry.

I know the building-and-loan associations all over this country are tremendously concerned about this bill. They are afraid of Government as a competitor. I have a telegram here from the head of one of the large groups of building-and-loan associations, Mr. C. H. Wade, of Los Angeles, Calif., who says:

General theory of housing act good, but certain amendments sponsored by the United States Building and Loan League vital for California associations. Request full discussion and record vote on striking out mortgage-insurance section. Bill provides Government backing for mortgages and unfair Government-sponsored competition and possibly ultimate ruination of community-thrift and home-financing institutions. Proponents of this section admit it is experimental, unsuccessful, when attempted by private capital and results will be neither immediate nor certain. The present objectives can best be obtained through existing building-and-loan associations. Capital-impairment provision penalizes California associations without reason and should be stricken out.

This comes from one of the leaders in this field, I may say to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The gentleman knows that in my State 95 percent of our mortgage-insurance companies are stockholding companies and not mutuals and there are 300,000 investors in these companies and 100,000 borrowers and $350,000,000 involved.

Mr. McFADDEN. I know the gentleman's State has almost as many building-and-loan associations, if not as many, as the State of Pennsylvania, and I am anxious that nothing is done to harm them in this bill. These people are rightfully concerned about the matter.

Now, as to the situation of these large mortgage companies which have taken, in a speculative way, mortgages on all kinds of buildings and have trusteed those mortgages and sold them to investors throughout the country, it would be a fine thing for such institutions now to have an opportunity through a Government-aided institution to unload millions of dollars' worth of these mortgages. I do not know whether such a plan is under contemplation, but this might be made possible through the organization of such a great Government institution. For instance, the New York Title & Mortgage Co. had outstanding a year or two ago a billion dollars' worth of guaranties. This institution was taken over by one of the large banks in New York, the Manhattan Trust Co., who recently turned the New York Title & Mortgage Co. loose after taking its deposits and taking its other resources, and they incorporated a new company with this billion dollars' worth of liabilities, and set it loose with one million and a half capital. We should see to it that these mortgage loans are not unloaded on Uncle Sam.

These are the things I am alluding to here that such companies should not be permitted to make use of a Government institution that is to be created with Government money, ostensibly for the purpose of aiding home owners, not only to build their homes, but to repair them, for the purpose of giving employment, for the purpose of aiding the industry of building materials and for the purpose of an economic readjustment in the United States which is so badly needed. Such an organization should not be used for dumping bad mortgage loans.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Do I understand from the gentleman's remarks it is possible under this bill to get money, not for the purpose of new construction, but for the purpose of refinancing debts incurred in past construction?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; I understand so.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I understood the purpose of this bill——

Mr. McFADDEN. The home owner can borrow also from his local institution which qualifies under this bill and his loans can be insured under the measure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any of the time of the House at this point, but I was rather concerned about the effect of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]. I did not want the Members of the House to start out with a misunderstanding about what had been done to this bill by our committee.

Please bear in mind that the aim of the committee, if I understand it at all, was to do that thing which the administration wanted done first—to stimulate building in order to reach down and help the durable goods and building industry. That we have done.

Our next objective was to do that which would help the small-home owner, and that we have done. When we struck out title II of this bill we made it impossible by the terms of the legislation to set up a national mortgage association. I want to tell you one thing that convinced me that that was the thing to do.

A gentleman by the name of Miller from New York State appeared before our committee. He came to endorse the bill as originally written. As a man sometimes will, he unconsciously made a damaging admission. It was a sufficient justification to anybody to kill title II. He said, "I represent a trust and savings institution that lends to banks, and", he said, "we have a State charter. We are now making it possible for home owners to borrow money to better advantage than you make possible under the terms of title II of the bill." Whereupon I said, "If the gentleman wants to give us a conclusive reason for killing title II—if he admits that under a State charter an institution may be set up that can do this job more economically and at a lower rate of interest than it can be done under the Federal institution, he has succeeded." There was no answer to that. It never has been answered.

What institution has done the most for the small-home owner? It is the building-and-loan association. Title II put them in competition with Federal institutions. It put them in competition with national mortgage associations, which were to be exempt from all income taxes and from all taxes now or hereafter to be imposed by the United States. In addition to this advantage over privately owned lending institutions, these national mortgage associations were to have the use of Government money. Talk about unfair competition. I would not be a party to setting up any institution with such unfair competitive advantages.

Long ago we authorized the R.F.C. to help the banks by buying preferred stock. The building-and-loan associations have been trying to carry on, and some of them are tottering now. We did under section 2 for these institutions precisely what we enabled the R.F.C. to do for banks.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, under the new title II, we made available to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation an additional billion and a half of money, with which it may purchase preferred stock in these building-and-loan associations and make it possible for them to give additional aid to small-home owners in the way of new loans. That is the second objective of the bill. There was not any politics in it. Title

II of this bill as you now find it was introduced by a member of the Democratic Party. The whole proposal was considered absolutely in a nonpartisan light, with the aim solely, I say to you, to pump out money into the building trades and reach down and help stimulate business in the durable-goods industries. This is the real explanation of the change in title II, and therefore I beg you not to be alarmed by the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], but to sit here and listen until in general debate and under the 5-minute rule we shall have an opportunity to convince you that there was no ulterior motive and no purpose on the part of our committee other than to serve the aim of the administration and help the general situation as affecting the building-trade industries.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will that portion of the expenditure that you set apart to buy stock in these building-and-loan associations pump any help into trade?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will not that simply allow these building-and-loan associations to get a stranglehold on this money that really ought to go for the benefit of these home owners?

Mr. BEEDY. The money finds its way to the small-home owner. The building-and-loan associations are to loan to these very home owners. These building-and-loan associations have probably loaned for home-building purposes more freely during the last 4 years than any other of our lending institutions. Some of them are very much hampered for lack of capital. This bill enables them to get capital to loan to home owners. They do not want it to hold in their capital set-up as idle money.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes; I yield to the author of title II as it is now in the bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The language is very clear. It provides that the funds must be used for new construction or for refinancing existing mortgages.

Mr. BEEDY. That is right; that is written into the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. But it makes no provision whatever to go on, on which to put these funds out. They can set their rate of interest and charge what they want for brokerage and attorneys' fees on title.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. We have fixed it so that the money will have to be used for loaning purposes, either for new construction or for refinancing existing mortgages.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. There seems to be quite a lot of solicitude on the part of building-and-loan associations with reference to section 105 of title I, the claim on their part being that it will handicap community thrift. Can the gentleman enlighten us with reference to the provisions of section 105 of title I in that regard?

Mr. BEEDY. In the time at my disposal I am frank to say that I cannot do that in a way satisfactory to the House; but others will do so.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I understood the gentleman to say that the money which will be advanced by the Home Owners Loan Corporation under title II as amended would go to buy preferred stock in building and loan associations. Is that correct, or is it common stock.

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Then it is common stock.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, when a future historian shall record the great messages that have been sent by the different Presidents to the Congress of the United States, excepting the Emancipation Proclamation, in my humble opinion, the greatest message thus far sent to any Congress is the stirring and humane communication sent by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, calling for consideration of the great triad, old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and preservation of the home. [Applause.]

Since the Seventieth Congress, during each session, I have repeatedly spoken upon this floor in behalf of and appealed to the membership of this House to enact legislation providing for the adoption of old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and preservation of the home. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, back of our Government, back of our religion and custom is the home. The home is the foundation of all society. Upon it the superstructure of all civilization rests. The home is the institution where the father is the king, mother the queen, and the children are the subjects. In every home, whether it be in the large cities or upon the plains, valleys, farms, or mountainsides, there is a little sentiment upon the walls which inspires every man, woman, and child, which says, "God bless our home." What sweet, tender memories this sentiment always evokes in our heart and mind. Faith and hope should never depart from these humble firesides. The home is the cradle that nurtures our offspring. The home is the institution that shapes the destiny of our brood. As go the parents, so go the children; as go the children, so goes the home; as goes the home, so goes the Nation and the world. Destroy the home, and you destroy society, civilization, and everything that goes with it. [Applause.]

Everyone is praying for happiness, for comfort, and prosperity to return to all who struggle for their daily bread in order that their home may be maintained. We are hoping for a new day to break in upon all of us. Today the mortgages upon the homes of millions of our people are being foreclosed. Hunger, penury, want, and destitution stare these millions in the face. Today the homes of these unfortunate people are being threatened as never before. Economic conditions threaten to achieve what fire, flood, wind, and invasion have never done before. Property is gone, fortunes have been swept away, men and women beyond middle age are back where they started—helpless and hopeless, not knowing where to turn for tomorrow's bread and shelter. And what is the cause of it all? It is the lack of money with which to preserve the home, rebuild the home, and build new homes.

Our honest and self-respecting citizens living in their modest homes have been imposed upon through chicanery, high-pressure salesmenship of stocks and bonds, fraudulent investments in guaranteed mortgages and failures of mismanaged banks and investment organizations that have fleeced them of their life's savings. Thus 10,000,000 of our American citizens are still helpless and hopeless, the tragic victims of this frightful economic depression that has deprived them of their homes and farms and robbed them of their present and future economic security. The message of President Franklin D. Roosevelt pleading for old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and the protection of the home has given them renewed faith, hope, and courage.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope the housing bill, now under debate and discussion, which will provide for the improvement of Nation-wide housing standards, will make possible the employment of labor, stimulate industry, improve conditions with respect to home-mortgage financing, prevent speculative excesses in new-mortgage investment, eliminate the necessity for costly second-mortgage financing, create a system of mutual mortgage insurance, and by making provision for the organization of additional institutions to handle home financing, promote thrift and protect savings, amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, amend the Federal Reserve Act, and for other purposes that would be instrumental in bringing about clearance of all slums and the building of new homes, will pass the House today and mark the triumphant victory of human rights over property rights. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the slums of great cities are the most terrible sores on the body politic. There is nothing that requires reformation more than the block tenements that are the pest holes of proud cities. The marble halls of business and finance, the splendid buildings that are the terminals of great railroads, the broad streets and fine highways that cities, States, and the Federal Government have built to make easy and comfortable the means of traffic communication between centers of population, are futilities, if the abodes of those who use them are focii of infection and of disease.

Starting at Eastport, Maine, and coming down along the Atlantic coast are sections unfit for human beings to live in. Tenements, some of them built a hundred years ago, with dark rooms into which the sun never casts its health-giving rays, with filthy hallways and so-called "courts" into which an outstretched arm touches the opposing wall, with sinks in the hallways and no provisions made for bathing or other necessary needs greet you everywhere. From these disease-breeding slums owned and operated by old aristocratic family estates and other heartless landlords the last penny that can be extracted in the form of rent is extorted that their owners may bask in the sunshine of Florida or find pleasure at St. Moritz, Monte Carlo, Nice, Villefranche, Cannes, Deauville, or other centers of play and amusement to the everlasting shame of the Nation and the degradation of its people.

Take New York City as an example—the Battery gives out on one of the most fascinating harbor views in the world. The Statue of Liberty stands with uplifted torch against the sunlit sky, a promise of faith and hope to all mankind. Broadway stretches away to the north, lined with magnificent towers of beauty and splendor. West Street, buttressed with great piers, harbors the shipping of the world with the products of every nation. But between Broadway and West Street are some of the worst tenements of which any city should be ashamed. Here, for generations, some of the poorest and least adaptable of our immigrants have found temporary shelter, if it can be called such, a shelter unfit for animals much less for human beings to live in.

Two great bridges spring from the shores of Manhattan to the strands of Brooklyn. One, the Brooklyn Bridge, is famous the world over; the other, the Manhattan Bridge, is a remarkable example of magnificent engineering, yet between these two splendid structures exists 200 acres of land comprising over 50,000 dilapidated old buildings; some of the worst tenements known to mankind. There are no words in the English language vile enough to describe the living conditions that are offered, at high rentals, to those who came to this land of freedom seeking health and happiness for themselves and their children. For more than a century, crime, disease, and immorality have festered together in these frightful pestholes.

Hope springs eternal in the human breast, as Pope expressed it, and that eternal hope has been the beacon light that has led some of our best citizens from these terrible tenements to the great places in the life of the Nation. These men and women could not look back with anything but loathing to the days of their childhood and youth. No vine-clad cottage lured their memories back to lovely and happy days. No rose gardens spread their blossoms in the first days of summer to lift their hearts to higher aspirations. If some of them succeeded in escaping from their early environment, it was because of that eternal hope for better things that animated them and not because of memories of a lovely home.

The East Side of New York, the district which nurtured Al Smith, its beloved, honored, and famous son, yes, its idol, has produced many splendid men and women, yet these people had their impetus within themselves and not from their environment. If they did as well as they have done with all these inhibitions, what might they not have accomplished if their initiation into life were under fine, healthy, and uplifting conditions instead of the depressing and unwholesome status from which only their determination to succeed enabled them to escape?

I have pointed out this section in which I live as an example. But there are other districts in New York City, as there are in other cities, cheap walk-up flats as well as unfit tenements, that are menaces to public health and decent citizenship. Boston, Providence, Springfield, Hartford, New Haven, Albany, Newark, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland, even the great Capital of our Nation, Washington, are infested with slums in alleys and back streets that will equal in squalor anything of which New York can be ashamed. Nor is this condition limited to the Atlantic coast. The same situation exists in the wide Mississippi Valley, in the Gulf States, and along the west coast. No city can point the finger of scorn at any other city and forget its own alley and back street pestholes.

The greatest problem facing mankind today should not only be the restoration of prosperity, the increase in commerce, the expansion of industry, the curtailment of crops, but, above all, it should comprise a provision for decent homes in cities; homes for the man who works with his hands; homes for the men and women who are in the so-called "white-collar class"; homes for children and for the youth of the land; homes for which they need make no apology in their later years, the sort of homes that youth can look back to when maturity is reached with a decent and wholesome pride, and not with apology. [Applause.]

Such homes cannot be built by idealistic dreamers filled with the aspirations of the Beaux Arts in Paris, the classicism of the Parthenon and Pantheon; the stately grandeur of St. Paul's in London; the splendor of St. Peter's in Rome; the beauty of St. Stephen's in Vienna; the mysterious beauty of St. Sophia in Constantinople; or the dignity and majesty of St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City. Human beings cannot live in comfort in monuments. A monument of architectural magnificence cannot be a home.

Stately colonnades do not balance with cozy kitchens, nor pediments with comfortable living rooms or nurseries. The line of the poet Moore, "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls", does not compare in its appeal to the human heart of the simple words of Payne's "be it ever so humble, there's no place like home."

In this House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States there are men from every walk in life. Men who come from the congested areas of large cities; men who come from the lesser cities, where life is less emphatic and who find time to think; men who come from small communities, where their communion with nature is so constant that they feel its impulses following them to this Capital, and who apply to their problems of legislation the great common sense of the soil, men who do not know, from actual experience, what slums are in great cities. To them, as well as to my colleagues who do know, I appeal for cooperation to demolish and stamp out these pathological slums, these dark, foul, pest-ridden tenements—humanity's deadliest foe.

We are all human beings, striving to do the best we can with what nature has given us to work with. Let me appeal to you my colleagues, you who are familiar with the open fields, the paths through the sweet woods, the green banks of streams, the feel of the bare earth through unshod feet, I invite the sympathetic cooperation of you men who have beheld the glory of the myriad stars at night, the splendor of the dawn and sunset, unmarred by high buildings, I beseech you who have felt the quiet of the still ponds and the serenity of lakes, and the soft silence that comes when the sun has set at its place in the west—to you, as well as to my colleagues who know only hard-paved streets, bare parks, ground to brown earth by the feet of playing children, I entreat you all to wipe out our slums, our national disgrace.

I insist that the slums of cities be eradicated, and that the festering sores of large communities be excised. I demand that the children of the cities be given fresh, clean air to breathe, wholesome places to sleep, open grounds in which to play, a chance to see the sky clear and undisturbed, a place to sit, not on the curbstone with feet in the putrid gutter, but where their feet may find solace and comfort from the clean earth—that good mother earth from which we all come, and to which we shall all return—that place in the sun, a place in the air, a place in the home. Only a few days ago our great and beloved President Roosevelt said "The slums must go", and go they will. The call of civilization and our American humanity must be heeded. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, you have provided for all that I have asked by the appropriation you have made for the purposes I set forth, but these appropriations have not been put to the purposes that you intended—the eradication of the slums of great cities. Instead of practical application of the money granted to produce the results you intended, great dreams have been dreamed, great plans have been planned—to do what? Not to eradicate the festering slums of great cities, but to build utopian communities outside these cities in their suburbs, in the outlying districts from which to his place of employment it will take a man in his car from half to an hour and a half to reach his job. Look at the advertisements in the "help wanted" columns in any newspaper—what do you find? "Man wanted—with car." It is not enough that the man wanted supplies his services, but he also must supply his transportation. No wonder Mr. Hoover wanted two cars in every garage. One to take the man to his job, and the other to take the children to school, the wife to market, and all on a bare subsistence wage. Could you do it? Could any man do it on a mere subsistence wage? No.

Forty years ago in New York City, when the region west of Central park and north of Fifty-ninth Street was being developed with apartment houses, tiled baths, electric lights, telephones, gas ranges, steam heat, hot water with janitor service, 5-room apartments rented for less than $30 a month in new buildings in good neighborhoods. There were no superintendents in those peaceful halcyon days; just janitors, and good ones too. Tenants were usually from month to month. No long leases were required. Often from 1 to 3 months rent free were given for the first year, if the incoming tenant only promised to stay for the second year without a lease being asked.

These apartment houses still exist, and, as they were well built most are still in fair-to-good condition. They are 40 years older. They have long since paid up their original cost and an income since then. But are the rents what should be asked for 40-year-old apartment houses? They are not. Their rents have been doubled, tripled, and quadrupled. Their assessed value has not been increased much but the amount asked when they are sold has risen in price comparable to the rise in rents. They have been sold and resold many times, each time at a greater price. There are exceptions, of course, but in the majority of cases, the facts are as I have given them. These apartments are used by the white-collar class in New York and are given fair care by their present owners although at extortionate rentals. Years ago leases were shifted from May 1 to October 1 by the owners, to avoid vacancies in the summer—vacancies that came when residents of New York began, about the first of this century, to go to bungalows at beaches, or suburbs, or country. The tenant usually got the worst of the deal when any shift was made—as he or she does today. Nor is this confined to New York. When President Coolidge approved the Welch Act, giving increases to Federal employees, the majority of landlords in Washington immediately raised their rentals to the amount of the increase so the Welch Act betterment was absorbed by the landlords.

I have spoken of the white-collar class of apartments in New York to use them as a comparison to the slum tenements. These apartments are usually half way decent, but if you want to see humanity at its worst housing, take a trip through any of the tenement districts in any of the five boroughs and you will be astounded at what is offered by greedy landlords, at exorbitant rentals, for human beings to live in. Yes; to live in. Crowded and herded together in never ventilated, small rooms, whole families swelter in the summer heat and shiver in the cold of winter. The fire escapes are their front lawns; the roofs are their parks; and for the children, in the summer, the hydrant furnishes their beaches.

The worst conditions do not show from the street, but in the back yard, where old law tenements are crowded into spaces once used for gardens, now, often, more fit for garbage. Sing Sing Prison at Ossining provides for convicts better housing than do most of these tenements. One sink in the hall often is the entire water supply for many families. Oil lamps are still used for lighting. The halls are seldom swept or scrubbed, though many of the women folk keep their rooms as clean as it is possible to make them, encrusted, as they are, with the dirt and grime of many preceding generations. Air spaces often are less than the square of the two-pane wide window. I have seen stables, cow barns, and public garages that were superior to these dens as living places.

To these slums in past generations came peasants from the green fields of Erin; from the lovely Rhineland; from the plains of Hungary; from the slopes of the Alps; from the lovely coasts of Italy; from the fjords of Norway; from the Welch hills and the highlands and lake region of Scotia; from the isles of Greece and the age-hoary mountains of Armenia; from The Steppes of Russia and the vales of Poland, and with them also came artisans from the greater and lesser cities of Europe, North Africa, and the two Asias, all seeking happiness, peace, and liberty in a free country. [Applause.]

How many young brides trying a hazard of new fortunes in the America of their dreams have found the sordid reality of the slums so soul-destroying, so heart-breaking, so terribly different from the humble but pleasant homes of their native country, that they have cried as only a homesick woman can cry, in deadly loneliness, in a strange country, speaking a strange language, and among strange people!

How many young husbands among these immigrants have eaten their hearts out with disappointment over their inability to provide better homes for their young brides and the mothers of their babes? And this not in some poverty-stricken country wasted by the ravages of centuries old wars, or rigid class distinctions, of life and death, of men and women, in the same status into which they were born, but in the wealthiest city the world has ever known, the commercial capital of the most prosperous of nations, the seat of three great and many lesser institutions of learning, of splendid museums and galleries of art, of magnificent theaters, of every convenience of modern civilization except those of decent housing for the poor.

Who is responsible for this state of affairs in which poor and hard-working men and women and children growing up into life and its opportunities are compelled to live in squalor amid surroundings unfit for human beings? The greed of landlords is primarily responsible. The laxity of local legislation controlling the existence of what can only be called "pesthouses" is partly responsible. The lack of voice crying from the housetops that these folks shall be provided with fit homes within their means has been partly responsible.

The lassitudinous diletantism of the man in whose charge these matters have been put for solution has been very much responsible since there has been earmarked for the use of the housing authority, by the Public Works Administration, the sum of $25,000,000 definitely for slum clearance and rebuilding of the slum sections in New York, which money was provided by Congress so that no responsibility can be laid at the door of the Members of this honorable body.

In addition to the twenty-five millions earmarked for slum clearance, there has been allotted $11,485,000 for other projects in better neighborhoods in Manhattan, the Bronx, and Queens. Congress has not been lax. Public Works Administration has not been lax. Secretary of the Interior Ickes has been very gracious, and the laxity lies at the door of the architect who should have prepared practical plans for the clearance of slum sections and the building thereon of model and modern apartment houses, if not of the type, along the lines of those erected in late years in Berlin, Vienna, London, and Moscow.

The name of the dreaming, pussyfooting, and dilatory architect is Robert D. Kohn, Director of Housing, Public Works Administration. He solely is responsible for this crying and tragic delay.

Slum clearance and rebuilding on the cleared area is not a new thing that has to be thought out over a long period of time and that involves difficult technical planning. In New York City the building of apartment houses in the last 40 years has almost been standardized into fixed-price classes. All the lighting, heating, plumbing, and cooking accessories are practically as standard as a pound of granulated sugar. Flooring of wood, tiling, terrazza, or other form is also standardized. The steel structure or the concrete structure involves no problem. Steel framework for any requirement is sold like coal by the ton and delivered as quickly. Concrete is as simple as sifting ashes. Elevators, stairways, gutters, fire escapes, shutters, interior trim, window framing are equally standard.

The money is ready as soon as plans are ready. What is there to dream about? A monument to architectural aestheticism? We have enough architectural monuments now in New York. What New York needs is slum clearance and the building of decent apartment houses, with modern equipment, on the slum sites.

The people who are anxiously waiting for such decent housing do not care whether the style of the curtain walls or the coping is modernistique, arabesque, paleo-renaissance, neo-renaissance, or Mozambique. What they want is immediate clearance of slums and decent houses put in their place; 5-story walk-ups or 10-story elevator apartments; the type of housing that is applicable to suburban development, as the rows of houses in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. Apartment houses are what are wanted. The apartment house is eminently suitable to Manhattan Island.

Manhattan Island is almost a solid block of gneiss. A central ridge runs through it from north to south. This gives a surface drainage into the three rivers, the North River, the East River, and the Harlem River, which makes Manhattan Borough of New York City one of the healthiest civic communities in the world. There is very little soil to absorb sewage, or the street dirt of a city, or any of the effluvia common to great cities.

Sailor's Snug Harbor, which owns a large tract of land in lower central Manhattan, and which is in my congressional district, has shown what can be done to provide decent housing at reasonable rates of rental.

Action—quick action—is what is needed. It may be a delightful occupation to dream of Sir Christopher Wren, Inago Jones, the Adams brothers, or to dally over the loveliness of Westover, Webley, Shirley, Haworth House, Red Hill, Poplar Forest, or other architectural anachronism.

Manhattan is New York. It will always be New York. The four sister boroughs in Greater New York are splendid sections, but Manhattan is New York. In the days before the consolidation that formed Greater New York, from the close of the Civil War to the start of the War with Spain, the heart of residential Manhattan was the region lying north of Twenty-third Street and between Broadway and Lexington Avenue, where beautiful residences were erected and occupied by old-time New Yorkers—a region now given over to great retail stores, theaters, Radio City, fine churches, and small smart shops.

REBUILDING OF SLUMS

Then came the development of Riverside Drive, with great apartment houses facing the North River, and this was succeeded by the tearing down of the old-style apartment houses and private residences on Park Avenue and the erection over the tracks used by the New York Central and the New Haven Railroads but still owned by the old New York & Harlem Railroad, which controls the north rail entrance to New York.

The pessimists said that people would never live in costly apartment houses built over railroad tracks. But the pessimists were in error, as they usually are, and the optimists won, as Park Avenue is now the finest residential street in the five boroughs that form New York City. If proper housing were built in the regions I have mentioned on the East Side, many who have moved away from Manhattan would return. Small parks for adults, playgrounds for children, would add to the attractiveness of the section, and while it would not rival Park Avenue, it would give decent, self-respecting people proper housing. But dreaming of architectural splendor never built any apartment house.

The East River, which is really a strait joining New York Bay with Long Island Sound, is one of the most attractive and one of the busiest stretches of watercourse in the United States. Every form of water craft, from junk boats to stately sound steamers, ply its waters day and night. In the summer the Detroit River is a busy place, but with winter its interlake traffic stops; but the East River, like Tennyson's brook, goes on forever, and it gives a beautiful outlook for the East Side through the four seasons of the year. If an east riverside drive, with a wide sidewalk on the water front, were built, it would pay—not only provide fine, healthy breathing space for the residents of the section but would increase the value of adjoining property, as did Riverside Drive on the west side of Manhattan. The development of Morningside Park from One Hundred and Tenth Street to One Hundred and Twenty-first Street was the primary cause of the selection of the heights to the west of Morningside Park as the site for Columbia University.

The transformation of Seventh Avenue from Twenty-third Street to Forty-second Street and the region abutting thereon was due to the location of the Pennsylvania Terminal on Seventh Avenue between Thirtieth and Thirty-third Streets. The city post office back of it, on Eighth Avenue, is another example of what may be done by the substitution of good buildings for shabby and unfit old ones.

Even when good buildings are replaced by better ones—Fourth Avenue from Twenty-third Street to Thirty-fourth Street being one example of this, and the substitution of the present buildings on Fifth Avenue from Twenty-third Street to Fifty-ninth Street for the old, stodgy brownstone fronts that lined that thoroughfare up to the beginning of this century is a conclusive example, not only of improvement in the status of the region but a strong appreciation in value of the land.

Nearly every city in the United States needs to be rebuilt in part. There are East Side pestholes in many of the largest cities of our Republic.

Suppose a great conflagration, like those at San Francisco and Baltimore, were to strike Manhattan and level the East Side to ruins and ashes; would the people of New York sit amid the wreck and weep, or would they begin to make plans, as did San Francisco and Baltimore, before the ruins were cooled off—as Boston and Chicago did before them? There is only one answer—New York would be rebuilt even better than before.

Why wait for a holocaust to clear the way? Must catastrophe lay a heavy hand on our great city before action is taken, to make its residential sections what they ought to be—the equal, if not the superior, of any model houses found today in all the world?

Must disaster overtake a city before the civic pride of all its citizens is aroused to reform abuses that are the result of generations of greed and neglect?

God forbid!

London began its work of rebuilding in 1666, after the great fire. It extended it at the end of the nineteenth century, when the Duke of Westminster of that time, the greatest landlord in London, tore out miles of rookeries and alleys back of Trafalgar Square, and replaced them with decent buildings and fine streets. Manchester, Birmingham, Bristol, Liverpool all cleaned up, as also did Edinburgh and Glasgow in Scotland. Berlin has replaced poor buildings and narrow streets with good buildings and wide streets. Vienna has done the same, as has Moscow on a much larger scale.

Why must the United States lag behind Europe? Why must New York follow the procession in improvements in living quarters, instead of leading it to splendid results along practical lines, instead of dallying with aesthetic sketches on drafting paper that are not even definite plans?

Why? Because Robert D. Kohn, Director of the Housing Authority, who ought to be thoroughly familiar with the urgent needs of New York in the matter of slum clearance and the building of decent apartments to replace ramshackle buildings—buildings, I repeat—that are unfit to house animals, much less human beings, plays with pencil and paper on an idealistic drafting board, instead of getting out practical plans that would put thousands at much needed work, and that would give proper housing to the poor and the moderately circumstanced people of New York, not only in the East Side but in other sections of the city.

Manhattan is proud of its citizens. They are proud of their city. A community that in less than 100 years has risen by its own energy and capacity, as well as its natural advantages, from a population of about 100,000 to be the focus of a cosmopolitan area containing 10,000,000 persons needs no explanation nor apologia from me, nor from anyone else. Manhattan is a cross section of the peoples of the world. The adventuresome; the challengers of fortune and fate; the seekers of freedom of person and liberty of thought and speech; the youth and the mature of all the races of the world.

They are not alien to each other as many carping critics assume. They were and are all inspired with optimism and the search for greater opportunities than were possible in their original homelands. Many of them brought little to the city but their capacity to work at many trades or at any work obtainable.

In their inexperienced greenhorn immigrant days they were exploited, often by shrewder and less honest members of their own races. But they have outgrown all that. Children came and these children went to American public schools and universities, and what they learned there they often taught their parents at home after school. Many a foreign-language immigrant has learned to speak English from his school-taught son. Many a mother has learned from her daughter how to speak and know the difficult new tongue.

As the children of the immigrants grew to manhood and womanhood and married they sought better homes in other sections of the city. In Brooklyn, Queens, the Bronx, Staten Island, and in Long Island, New Jersey, Westchester, and in Fairfield. The old folks remained in the old home, the home of their youth in this country. As other immigrants came in they took the places made vacant by the removal of the second generation, and this has gone on since the Civil War.

If these residents are to become Americanized, are to become citizens, they need some practical demonstration of the pledges made in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. Their bill of rights should start with the right to live in a decent home amid decent and healthy surroundings.

The money has been earmarked for the purpose of providing such homes. The United States Government by its appropriation of funds has shown in the most emphatic way—by the allotment of money—its intention to achieve this purpose. Why should its intention be delayed in execution by the errant will of a single individual—one who from experience should be most sympathetic? Is the director of the housing authority a friend of the poor and lowly, or is he a little brother to the exploiting landlord who seeks no charge in the pest-hole slums of our cities?

Second Avenue, which is in the heart and center of my congressional district, was planned to be when originally laid out what Fifth Avenue has become today—the greatest thoroughfare in New York. On Eighth Street and Second Avenue is the old St. Mark's Church in the Bowery, which was the garden spot of New York and where lie the mortal remains of the famous Dutch governor, Peter Stuyvesant, who was the ancestor of our distinguished colleague HAMILTON FISH, colloquially known to us as "HAM FISH", the ferocious nimrod of modern communism.

Americanized continental Europe to the extent of the third and fourth generation is well represented in my district—Germans, French, Spanish, Italians, Swiss, Austrians, Hungarians, Poles, Ukrainians, Swedes, Danes, Czecks, Slovaks, English, Scots, Irish, Jewish are all represented as courageous and patriotic Americans in the Fourteenth Congressional District of New York. The best blood of Europe, who came here to seek adventure and fortunes in America, whose sons and daughters and their descendants represent today the highest grade of modern civilization, are found in our midst.

New York City is the most cosmopolitan city in the world. My congressional district is the most cosmopolitan section of any congressional district in America. Its diversified citizenship represents a cross section of the life of our Nation. Rich and poor, high and low, success and failure are represented in my district. All my fellow citizens of my community are inspired by one common ideal: "Be it ever so humble, there is no place like home." However, they feel that this home to which they aspire should be in conformity with the high standards of the twentieth century, a clean, wholesome, habitable, modern, up-to-date American home. That is what I, as their Representative, appeal to you to grant to them as their just and human right. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the Tennessee Valley project, which was perfected, elaborated, and developed through the construction of the great Muscle Shoals, is a great pioneer project in public power production. This national experiment cost the taxpayers of the United States hundreds of millions of dollars and will improve the social, economic, and agricultural opportunities of the great States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, and Arkansas. The members of the New York delegation, including myself, voted for that project to help the people of the Middle South.

When the tributaries of the Mississippi overflowed their banks and brought ruin and havoc in the homes, hearts, and firesides of most of our Americans living in that section, almost $400,000,000 was voted by the Congress of the United States to prevent the future ravages of the Father of Waters. Our congressional delegation from New York, including myself, voted for that measure.

Boulder Dam, one of the greatest engineering feats in the history of our Republic, that will revolutionize irrigation possibilities of many western arid lands and serve cheap electricity to eight States of the Union, cost the taxpayers of the United States more than $400,000,000. We, the members of the congressional delegation from New York, voted for that project to help the great States of the West.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been appropriated by the Rivers and Harbors Committee for public works improvements for harbors and rivers that will bring happiness and prosperity to different sections in our country. Our delegation in Congress from the State of New York has voted for these improvements that will benefit our neighboring and far-distant States throughout the Union.

Mr. Speaker, the time has arrived when the great Empire State of New York, talking through its congressional delegation for the greatest city in the world, New York City, appeals to the membership of the Congress of the United States to help it eradicate and clean out the 150-year-old slums and pest holes that are still called homes and are found in every part of Greater New York. We should concentrate on the Nation's greatest slums in New York City, comprising over 1,000 acres in Greater New York, as a major experiment in improving housing and living conditions of the working classes through the securing of cheap rentals that will be within the reach of the great producing masses. We should immediately perfect a comprehensive long-range housing program that will act as a guide for the rest of the country to follow. This program will act as the foundation of the new deal. Upon it the superstructure of new homes will be reared. It will end unemployment and help to bring us back to prosperity. [Applause.]

Greenwich Village, originally one of the early settlements of the English in New York City, later the home of Thomas Paine, and today the home and mecca of the literary and artistic colonies of our Republic, is also in my congressional district.

All these locations today need rehabilitation. They are crying aloud for clean, wholesome, modern homes that have the equipment and appurtenances that modern civilization demands.

Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues in the House, think of it! At this very moment 2,000,000 New Yorkers still live in old slum law tenements. Fifty percent of the tenements condemned by the tenement-house commission of 1885 are still standing, harboring unfortunate people who have to live in these contaminated and vitiated homes.

England, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Holland are half a century ahead of us in model housing and construction.

A survey of vacant apartments in New York City showed 3 out of 4 without hot water, 4 out of 5 without steam heat, 3 out of 5 served by water closets in the hall. In the slum areas of New York the death rate from TB averages 113 per 100,000, as compared to 27 per 100,000 in nonslum areas.

In the congressional district, the Fourteenth New York, that I have the honor to represent in Congress there still stand houses that were built before the Revolution. In some of these houses still live the descendants of the original builders. In my district stands the splendidly noble Washington Arch through which the returning soldiers of the last two wars marched in quiet triumph. Fifth Avenue, that street the name of which is known the world over, starts at Washington Square, the site of the Washington Arch.

On Fifth Avenue, in my district, lived the beloved Mark Twain, Samuel Langhorne Clemens, and he was only one of the many thousands who rose to fame and lived at least part of their lives in my community. But my district also has produced many men and women who never rose to public notice but who were and are splendid fathers and mothers, God-fearing, decent, wholesome folk, rearing their families in honesty and truth and bringing their children up to be good, self-supporting and self-respecting American citizens.

My district is a cross section of the Nation and of the world. Every State of the Union is represented therein by its sons and daughters who have come to New York to test their fortunes. Every nation and race of the world is represented in my district by immigrants who have sought in the United States the freedom they were denied in their own countries.

My district is both east side and west side, and almost runs "all around the town", as the song goes. Much of it has been rebuilt. All of it ought to be rebuilt with deeper and more secure foundations and higher-living buildings set in parked spaces, open to the sun and air. The homes of the people of my east side should be as healthy, commodious as the homes of my constituents on the west side. The same number of persons could be housed in tall towers like the present towers of finance and commerce in New York, each in its own park, as are now jammed into wretched, insanitary tenements.

Trinity Church Corporation owns many of the worst of the tenements, and that institution might become more popular than it is if it started the work of rebuilding its slums. That is the gospel of true Christianity.

This is the twentieth century, and the housing in great cities, especially New York, must proceed along twentieth-century lines. Our first thought should be the comfort and happiness of the men and women who are to live in the cities and work at every form of human endeavor and not the amount of profit that may come from extortionate rentals.

Let us therefore build wholesome homes for decent people—homes that will be clean, sanitary, commodious, and serve as the index of the civilization of our day.

Mr. Speaker, what the Nation needs is a great national drive for the entire eradication of the slums of all the large cities. These places of pest, these tragic sources of disease, these obsolete structures that are not fit to house an animal, much less a human being, should be leveled to the ground and in their places erected housing suitable for the living quarters of the men, women, and children of the American family wherein they can live in decent dignity commensurate with the greatness of the Nation of which they are citizens.

This should be done now, immediately. Not piecemeal and over a period of time, but now, at once, when such great effort is being made to restore employment and to return to prosperity. The building trade is one of our basic industries. It gives employment to all classes of labor: To the lumberman who fells the trees that are made into lumber that goes into construction; the lumber-mill worker who changes the timber into beams, pillars, posts, shingles, and other structural lumber; the trim maker who makes the doors, window sashes, and other trim; the brickmakers and stonecutters and the clay banks and quarries from which they get their base supply; steam and water piping makers; electrical-wire makers, and other supply manufacturers and other building supply makers. It would give new impetus to railroads and motor trucks to transport the material.

Architects and their staffs, stonemasons, bricklayers, tile layers, plasterers, plumbers, painters, pipefitters, electricians, would be put to work at once. There is not another industry that uses so many different sources of supply, obtained from so many sources all over the country, as does the building industry. It would invigorate these trades I have mentioned at once, start pay rolls going, and do more to restore prosperity and happiness to those who can labor and cannot find work than anything I can think of.

With newer houses would also come modern equipment for living, electrical and gas refrigeration, electrical and gas lighting, better light fittings, new bathtubs and bathroom fittings, radios, telephones, better furniture, rugs, pictures, kitchen utensils, and other innumerable devices, besides modern methods of cooking. All along the line there would be gigantic improvement in means of living. It would be a design for living that would give the American people in the cities what they should have and what they easily could have. Its influence would be Nation-wide. It would put the entire Nation again happily at work.

Competition would force the owners of semislums to reconstruct their properties and to reduce their outrageous rents in competition with the low rentals that would be charged for this new construction. It would force improvement in the single and double houses, since no one would care to live in them unless they met the new requirements of this American pattern of living, which should be national and not local, so that all would benefit.

Had this been done 2 years ago, when, in January 1932, I introduced in the House two bills providing ways by which such a project could be financed under the control and direction of the Government of the United States, and had Robert D. Kohn, Director of Housing, instead of dilly-dallying over aesthetic dreams set resolutely to work to do that for which he was given his place in the public service, the work of national building construction, which should be universal throughout the Nation, would have been half done, and there would have been no need for the President to include in his last message to Congress any proposals covering housing in any form.

The Federal Government, of which the citizens of every State are also citizens, should sponsor, finance, and, if necessary, construct the type of collective and single family homes that I have described. It should not turn over many millions to the unscrupulous real-estate mortgage racketeers and criminals who mulcted the investors of America of billions of dollars. Citizens should be able to deal directly with the Government through agencies and not have Federal money advanced to the same group of unscrupulous highbinders and their successors who wrecked so many fake real-estate financial projects to the lining of their own pockets.

Much of the money could be obtained from the Postal Savings, on which the depositors get a low interest. The interest charged the borrower should not be over 4 percent per annum. Principal amortization should run not less than 20 years—30 if necessary—the same as is being done today in Europe and in South America. The Postal Savings would be well secured by investment in the homes of American people. This collateral security of the real estate and the home, in my humble opinion, is superior security to most of the paper that is rediscounted in the Federal Reserve banks of our country today.

In each of the States of the Union and in the District of Columbia Federal home-loan agencies could be established and the present Federal home-loan set-up could be modified so that instead of giving the money for homes to these real-estate sharks it would go directly to the people themselves. Details are not needed; they can be worked out later. The general idea is the thing.

By this method there would be no gigantic collapse of mortgage-loan groups, which has been one of the most distressing and lamentable of the disasters of the depression, because it worked two ways—it wrecked the investor and it wrecked the borrower.

Congress last year created the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Today it is operating in every State in the Union, and has saved over 200,000 homes from foreclosure, worth over $600,000,000, and is operating to save from foreclosure over a million homes, the value of which will run into billions of dollars. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation is paying millions of dollars in delinquent taxes to local communities; is spending millions of dollars in repairs, thus increasing employment, and is restoring income to tens of thousands of investors, thereby aiding and increasing purchasing power.

No word in the English language brings up a more tender sentiment than the word "home." It is the foundation upon which the superstructure of our Government is reared.

If the word "home" has great significance, the actual thing itself, with all its loving associations has a far deeper hold on the human heart. The saving of a home is a most worthy effort. It keeps the family together and preserves the family and relative ties. Best of all, it provides a secure haven for the young folks. It gives them an incentive to establish another such home when they grow up, meantime protecting those who are not secure in family life. [Applause.]

The operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation not only have saved homes for their owners, but the obligations it has incurred in so doing will be cleared by the income coming to it by amortization, with no cost to the taxpayer.

Through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation the Federal Government makes it possible for every wage earner to own his own home in which he will live and be secure, not only while his family is growing up but in his old age when they have flown to new nests. It has been proved that a single plan of home-mortgage financing on a long-term basis insures complete security for the lender, and gives the borrower confidence that he can carry through his obligations to the very end.

The 5-day week and the 6-hour day, now on its way, and the shorter hours of labor now in effect and coming on, will give the working man more time to spend at home, if he has a home. This will mean that he will know his wife and children better, understand and sympathize with them problems and help solve them. It does not mean that the man will be a "nuisance around the house", but it does mean that he can do much of the work that now falls to the lot of the wife, and as four hands are better than two, the work will be done quicker and provide more leisure for them to develop their adult education and interests.

In every great crisis of war, on its own soil, or abroad, in which the United States has been engaged since its foundation, it has called on the men of the homes to protect the Government, the wealth of the Nation, and the property of the Nation. Now has come a great crisis of peace, of longer duration than any of the last three wars in which the Nation has been engaged, in which not only the men, but the women and the children of the homes have endured trial and suffering equal to and superior to that of actual war.

As it was the duty of the men of the homes to rally to the defense of their country in time of combat—war—to which they nobly responded, so now it is the equal duty of their country, and its wealth and property in this time of a prolonged and terrible crisis of peace, to come to the aid of those on whom it and they must always rely for preservation. The home is the basic foundation on which the welfare of our Republic is built. If the homes, single or collective, fell into dilapidation and decay, those who live in the homes will become the victims of destitution and despair. Who, then, will defend the Nation, the Nation's wealth and its property when our Republic and its wealth and property is not only confronted with enemy attack but, possibly, engaged in a terrific struggle for its very existence and preservation?

Can the Government, as such, defend itself? No! Can wealth, as such, defend itself? No! Can property, as such, defend itself? No! Can the Nation defend itself against a foe determined to conquer a rich and fertile country? They cannot! Men are needed to fight. Today our working classes need homes in times of peace. Not any kind of a structure that a grasping landlord would think fit, but what the American citizen and his family think adequate, just, fair, and proper. Construction is needed. Immediate construction. Now! At once! Let us build new homes for our working classes. [Applause.]

More construction and still more construction, until every American family can live in a decent home and have all the comforts and happiness that such a home will provide. Let the Government build new homes, collective and single, for the men and their families, on whom its very existence depends. Let the building continue over decades, if need be, until the work is complete. Let there not be left in the entire Nation a slum, a dilapidated shack, at which the finger of scorn can be pointed. Then every American family will be housed in healthy and happy habitations and the Government will have done its duty to those who work in every quarry of human endeavor, to make our country great, rich, glorious, and prosperous, the noblest Republic in all the world. [Applause.]

Reconstruction, or repair of old structures, is not what public opinion demands. What the great masses of our people are clamoring for is the construction of new buildings and the clearance of slums in our great cities. This problem will not be solved until the old pest holes are deliberately wrecked and in their places are erected newly built homes of which humanity may be proud and the tenants not be ashamed.

The day for expediency has passed away. The moment for action has arrived. Expediency will no longer serve. It only plasters the sore and does not heal it. We must cure these slum sores that exist everywhere in our civic communities. There is only one way to accomplish this purpose and that is to face the housing problem frankly, fearlessly, courageously, honestly, by admitting our errors in the past and starting fresh and anew to accomplish our purposes and our ideals. Will the clearance of slums pay? It certainly will. Not only in improved citizenship but in the health and happiness of our working people as well as in cold financial returns.

In all the great cities of Europe slums have been supplanted by decent, wholesome housing where human beings can live as God intended them to exist. Let us make a new start right here in America. Let the "new deal" be given in housing to those who have been the tragic victims of the "raw deal" in the past.

Congress will soon adjourn. Let us refuse to adjourn until this wholesome human appeal for habitable homes will have been given to the citizens of our Republic, who are entitled to the best that civilization and humanity can give to them. Let the building of new ideal homes be the contribution of the Seventy-third Congress of the United States to the people of our country, whom we have been sent here to serve and represent. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New York 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, the home is the place where we are treated the best and grumble the most. Millions of men, coming from every home in our Republic, have been willing to give up their lives upon the altar of war and bare their breasts to shot and shell in order that our homes might be preserved. From the Fourteenth Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent, immigrants from every clime in the world, as well as natives, have gladly made the supreme sacrifice and hallowed our soil and foreign soil with their lifeblood in order that our Republic and our institutions might be preserved.

Mr. Speaker, without our homes we would be a Nation of nomads, wanderers on the face of the earth, with no settled habitation nor permanent abode. Every act passed by Congress, no matter how apparently remote, in its final results affects the home. The act may deal with economics, finance, industry, agriculture, or commerce, but it becomes a good or bad law according as it helps or harms the home.

The home must and shall be preserved; on its preservation depends the perpetuation of the Republic itself. We, Members of the Congress of the United States, will do our duty to our Nation and its people only when our first and last thought is, How will our work in Congress affect the home, and how will it affect and maintain the welfare, the happiness, and the contentment of the father, the mother, and the children of the home? Let us give thanks to President Franklin D. Roosevelt for his courageous message to abolish slums and build new homes. God bless the homes in America. Be it ever so humble, God, help us to preserve and maintain the American home. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, 8 minutes, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I feel that before the time comes really to discuss this bill, which, of course, will be done in detail and in his usually able fashion, by the Chairman of the Banking and Currrency Committee, we should have clearly in mind the different viewpoints which various individuals in this House and in the country have, as to the way in which the object of this bill can best be accomplished.

The bill is called a "housing bill." That is really a misnomer. We should face the fact right here that the main purpose of this bill is to pump money out, as soon as possible, into the building industry, because the general feeling of economists, from those in the administration down all through the rank and file of this country, is that one of the chief troubles with our economic situation is that money is not being spent in the building industry and in the durable-goods industries which rely to a great extent on building. If we can get money spent in building, there will be more money spent in the buying of furnaces, in the buying of refrigerators, and in the buying of everything that goes into homes. I say we should have that fact firmly in mind, because there are various lines of thought as to how that can best be accomplished. There are those who feel that the building and loan association movement itself is capable of achieving the result, as it has very well in the past. They maintain that if something is done to help building and loan associations, by giving them additional money through the purchase of preferred stock, and by insuring their deposits so that their depositors will not try to withdraw their money, the building-and-loan associations can handle the situation. There are those who feel that the building-and-loan association movement is not enough, and that if we will only get rid of many of the distressed mortgages which are hanging over the country, somehow sop up those mortgages which everybody knows are selling at starvation prices today, money will be made available which can be used in the building industry.

There are those who feel that neither of those things will operate quickly enough or efficiently enough, and that we must give additional money to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to continue the Government in the business of acquiring mortgages and lifting this mortgage load off the general market.

I have summarized the three absolutely distinct theories which are held on this subject. It should be pointed out that all three features are covered in this bill. The committee has not tried to decide or tried to reach any conclusion as to which theory should be followed. It stands to reason that if any man here has the theory that one particular viewpoint is correct, he is naturally opposed to certain other things in the bill.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. It has been said that this money is supposed to go to refinancing existing mortgages. If that is so, if you are going to take part of this money and refinance existing mortgages, how is that going to place money available for building new homes?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Well, the gentleman has not read the bill completely. That is one aspect of it. The theory has been advanced by the President's emergency economic council that there is plenty of money available for this kind of work, but as long as there are many mortgages which can be bought at starvation prices there will be little money available for new building. They say that if you insure those of these mortgages which are properly insurable and which are now hanging over the market, capital will be available to take them until times get better, and there will thus be built up a ready market for new mortgages. This new money will go out into the field to stimulate new construction.

Mr. BLOOM. This bill calls for $200,000,000, does it not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Oh, no; not only that. It calls also for a billion and a half dollars additional for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and for various other items.

Mr. BLOOM. For the refinancing of these existing mortgages?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The bill calls for mortgage insurance up to $1,000,000,000 on existing mortgages and $1,000,000,000 on new mortgages. I would rather not explain the bill now to the gentleman. If the gentleman has not read the bill in full, he will have a very good understanding of it when it is explained by the chairman of the committee. What I am trying to point out is that there are these different theories and that we have tried to cover them in the bill. I think it would be very unfortunate if any Member feeling very strongly about one particular theory would condemn the bill because other theories are also carried in it.

Mr. BLOOM. I am simply asking for information.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I cannot yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to keep the record straight?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. On page 54 of the bill, section 202, there is a provision authorizing $1,500,000,000 to be loaned by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I just made that statement to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. As I understand it, the bill, as now worded, does not provide for the financing of low-cost housing; is this correct?

Mr. HOLLISTER. It does not provide for the financing of low-cost housing.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. But section 5 of the original bill so provided.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Section 5 of the original bill provided for insuring mortgages on low-cost housing.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. That provision has been stricken out.

Mr. HOLLISTER. But that had nothing to do with the financing of those projects. If the gentleman will recall, the financing of those projects has been carried on by the Public Works Administration. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield further; my time is limited.

I am merely trying to bring to the attention of the Members the fact that there are these three theories to which I have referred. The incorporation of all these three theories will, we hope, give us a workable bill. It may be that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is the proper agency to get results. Perhaps the mortgage-insurance feature will do the work. Perhaps the building-and-loan associations will do it. Whichever one of these theories can best do the work can later be expanded.

We have covered every one of these features in this bill. It provides an opportunity, you might say, to try them out and see which one will help building most. It may be that a combination of two of the provisions, or all three together, will do the job. We hope the bill will provide some way to accomplish the purpose desired.

The committee did a great deal of hard work; it heard a great many witnesses, and we have reported a bill which can be safely adopted by this House as a fair way to see if it is not possible to stimulate the building industry.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Is there any provision of the bill which will assist building-and-loan associations to pay their withdrawing members?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes; there is a whole title devoted to the insurance of building-and-loan deposits. Now, if the deposits are insured and the depositors know they can get their money, as a rule they do not want their deposits. The deposits in sound institutions will be insured.

Mr. MOTT. Is the deposit itself insured?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The deposit will be insured.

Mr. MOTT. How about existing deposits?

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the building-and-loan association can qualify, it is eligible for insurance. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this rule should be adopted, because there is a wide-spread interest not only in the House but throughout the country in legislation of this character. The rule is a wide-open rule, one that will permit the offering of amendments to any feature of the bill. Any Member will be given this opportunity, I am sure.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. FOCHT. Let me ask the gentleman a question before he starts his dissertation on this question. Is there anything in the bill that provides for the substitution of the shack, of the slum, or anything beyond financing the financiers who are going to refinance, and so forth? We want to know whether the bill will reach down to the bottom. Will the gentleman tell us about that?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Replying to the gentleman, I repeat, that the rule is a wide-open rule and the gentleman can offer any amendment he pleases. I would rather some member of the committee explain the bill in detail.

Legislation is a matter of compromise. No doubt there are many features in the bill that will not be pleasing to all of us; but after we have submitted our amendments and the House has spoken its judgment, I feel that we shall have a bill that will meet the requirements and the purposes the administration had in mind with reference to this legislation.

We must have more adequate and comfortable housing conditions for our people. There has been too wide-spread a difference between extreme luxury on the one side in this Nation and bad housing conditions, especially in the metropolitan centers, of the poor and the working people. We all appreciate that we have a country blessed with great natural resources and natural wealth. This legislation is calculated to make a better distribution of the blessings of this wealth to all classes, that we may have more comfortable living conditions and may preserve the home in its integrity and the people in greater comfort; that we may make some advancement in the future ages over what we have made in past ages.

I think our Government is to be praised that we are launching out into this type of legislation, this policy of lending the aid of our Federal Government to improve the health, to improve the surroundings and the living conditions of our people that we may develop finer citizens in the future than we have had in the past; and that the blessings of wealth and of the administration of law in the control of that wealth may be more wide-spread in the future than it has been in the past.

One of the purposes of law is to protect the weak, and if people have lived under conditions which have destroyed their health, their usefulness, their comforts, and the blessings of a civilized community in which they live, then we should improve that condition.

I am greatly interested in the building-and-loan associations of our Nation. I think they have performed a great function, not only to borrowers but to investors, by organizing this mutuality of interest. One person desires to save and another person desires to borrow and buy a home. Nothing should be done to destroy the powers and the functions of these local mutual building-and-loan associations from carrying on; and this bill is calculated to supplement the services they have rendered and to aid them to still further expand their activities. I am glad to see the Government extending this service to one of the greatest institutions of our Nation—the mutual building-and-loan association.

Something has been said about this bill not being an administration measure. I do not know whether anyone knows all of the details of what the President desires in connection with this bill. We know that he desires the bill. I think the President of the United States has demonstrated his capacity to leave a few things to the Congress of the United States; and, after all, under the Constitution we have certain duties to perform. One of these duties is to formulate legislation. May I compliment the Committee on Banking and Currency. It has had a heavy program during this session of Congress and has reported out a number of very important measures. I think it has been motivated only by the very highest of intentions and the fullest responsibility.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Who drew the original housing act, the one which has been stricken out?

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman will have to ask a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman is not a member of that committee?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am not a member. I am sure the gentlemen on the committee will be able to defend whatever has been done in committee. There may be those who are opposed to the action taken, but this bill represents the majority views of the committee, and after all it is the purpose of the House of Representatives to take the committee report and do with it what it pleases, enacting legislation in the light of the judgment of all the Members of the full House. This rule permits that. It deals with a great question; and I believe the rule will be adopted and that the bill in its final form will be a bill which will improve conditions.

I shall support the measure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (H.Res. 418) (Rept. No. 1954) for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 418

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation the Committee on Ways and Means, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to further conduct an investigation (1) of the operation and effect of the internal-revenue laws of the United States and the existing rules and regulations for the administration thereof, with a view to determining methods of improving and simplifying, and of preventing evasion and avoidance of such laws, and (2) of possible new sources of revenue.

The committee shall report to the House at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation, including such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

For such purposes the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman, and may be served by any person designated by him.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FORMULATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (H.Res. 435) (Rept. No. 1953) for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 435

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 265, a joint resolution providing for the preparation and completion of plans for a comprehensive observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formulation of the Constitution of the United States, and all points of order against said joint resolution are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

NATIONAL HOUSING, EMPLOYMENT, AND INSURANCE

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to file minority views on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9620) to improve Nation-wide housing standards, provide employment, and stimulate industry; to improve conditions with respect to home-mortgage financing, to prevent speculative excesses in new-mortgage investment, and to eliminate the necessity for costly second-mortgage financing, by creating a system of mutual mortgage insurance and by making provision for the organization of additional institutions to handle home financing; to promote thrift and protect savings; to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act; to amend the Federal Reserve Act; and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9620, with Mr. GLOVER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this bill has received the most painstaking consideration by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House that could be given during the limited time allowed, and in the midst of the conditions which exist in these last days of the session. The measure is of great importance to the country and of profound interest to Members of the House, as well as to the members of the committee who have had it under consideration. It is not possible under the time allowed for any one speaker to discuss the bill in as much detail, and in all its phases, as might be desired and as would be permitted under different conditions.

The measure embodies provisions as to which there were necessarily differences of opinion in the Banking and Currency Committee, as there are differences of opinion in the House and among the citizens of the country. The bill as presented to the House represents the usual action of committees in undertaking to arrive at a combined judgment. Such judgment, of course, always involves the surrender of views on the part of some who join in the final conclusion. Such is the history of this bill.

I think it is fair to say that no member of the Banking and Currency Committee was able to have embodied in this proposal everything representing his individual views with nothing added. It is the combined judgment of the committee, representing what was thought to be the best that could be agreed upon under the circumstances. The legislation represents another major attack by the administration in the struggle to overcome the forces of destruction to bring about a restoration of normal employment conditions in the United States.

A vast portion of the unemployed throughout the land represent labor ordinarilly employed in the building world. We are advised that 1,350,000 families, representing more than 6,000,000 people now on relief rolls are identified with the building trades. This bill is an attempt to secure a resumption of construction of homes and in the general real-estate field to relieve unemployment and to elevate living conditions. It is designed to accomplish economic improvement and to promote social values.

The measure represents an effort to stimulate private initiative, private effort, and private investments. We have sought to utilize the smallest possible amount of Treasury aid and assistance at the expense of the Government in the hope that by the use of a small amount of such funds we may invite and induce private capital to find investment along normal lines in the building and construction field. There are ample funds lying idle in the banks and in the hands of individuals to take care of all of the activities that are desired in the work that we seek to stimulate by the enactment of this measure. It is thought that we may be able, by the use of the aid employed, to obtain the largest return, by stimulating investment of funds now idle, which it is very much desired should be invested in this field of home construction and improvement. Under title I a corporation is established with a capital of $200,000,000 to be provided by the Government, the corporation to be known as the "Home Credit Insurance Corporation."

This Corporation is authorized to insure such approved financial institutions as are subject to public regulation against losses upon advances made by them to provide funds to improve real estate, with a proviso that no advance eligible for such insurance shall exceed $2,000, and with the proviso that no institution shall be insured against losses in excess of 20 percent of the total amount so advanced by such institution. The insurance is not limited to 20 percent of individual advances, but insures financial institutions against all losses on such advances up to a total amount of not exceeding 20 percent of the total amount so advanced. The purpose of this provision is to provide property owners with funds which they desire to borrow to maintain, protect, and to improve their properties, by providing this insurance for these institutions so as to induce them to make the money available to the individual property owner.

In order to make more certain that banks and other financial institutions will make this money available to property owners over reasonably long periods of time to be paid back monthly, provision is made for this Corporation to contract to advance and to advance to such insured institutions 100 percent of the face value of such insured obligations of property owners upon the security of such insured obligations. The purpose of this provision is to put the institution making these comparatively long-term advances to property owners in a position in the event of necessity to secure funds on these comparatively long-term loans.

This Corporation is also authorized to insure amortized mortgages on homes on a mutual basis under regulations which will make the same self-supporting and involve no greater cost to mortgagors and mortgagees than that needed to cover the cost involved and necessary expenses. In the case of mortgages on existing homes, the same to be eligible for insurance must not exceed 60 percent of the appraised value of the property; and in the case of mortgages against homes built after this act takes effect, the same shall not exceed 80 percent of the appraised value of the property. No mortgage is to be insured under this plan if the same is against property appraised at more than $20,000. The total amount of mortgages against existing homes which may be insured is limited to five times the capital of the Corporation, and the total amount of mortgages against new homes which may be insured is limited to five times the amount of the capital of the Corporation.

Under title II, which has been referred to in some of the addresses heretofore, we have undertaken to enlarge the service which is now being rendered by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. We add $500,000,000 to the funds which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation may use to provide for advances for construction and repair and to contribute to the early employment of labor in the construction, repairing, and improving of homes and small business properties; the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 is amended so as to authorize the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to provide funds for Federal savings-and-loan associations, building-and-loan associations, under State charters, and savings banks and insurance companies, which are members of Federal home-loan banks, so as to enable them to make such advances. The method providing for the making of such advances is by the purchase of shares in these associations or the making of deposits in savings banks or loans to insurance companies, and the funds are to be returned at the end of 5 years, at a rate not exceeding 10 percent in any one year. The amount of these advances is not to exceed $5,000,000.

In order to provide the funds for the advances above mentioned, which are to be reloaned to home owners; and in order to increase the resources of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to provide for the direct and immediate relief of individual home owners beyond its present resources, the bond issue of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is increased from $2,000,000,000 to $3,500,000,000.

Under title III we set up a corporation with $100,000,000 capital, subscribed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to enable the Corporation to establish a Federal building-and-loan insurance corporation.

This Insurance Corporation is authorized to insure accounts not exceeding $2,500 in building-and-loan, savings-and-loan, and homestead associations, and cooperative banks, whether the same are members of a Federal home-loan bank or not. This insurance does not attempt to provide for the liquidity of these savings but merely to provide that the saver will get his money back through the orderly processes of these associations; or in the event of liquidation, that this Insurance Corporation will pay the saver 10 percent of his money in cash and 50 percent of the remainder in 1 year, and the balance in 3 years. Such associations are insured only after proper application and examination and they are required to pay an annual premium equivalent to one-half of 1 percent of the total amount in the accounts of all insured members plus their creditor obligations until such premiums build a reserve in the Insurance Corporation equivalent to 5 percent of all insured accounts; and in addition these associations are subject to an assessment of an additional one-fourth of 1 percent of the total amount in the accounts of all insured members plus their creditor obligations to cover any losses which may have been incurred.

This insurance, except in the case of Federal savings-and-loan associations, is voluntary and will become effective only if such associations apply for it and are accepted. The Federal savings-and-loan associations are required to take the insurance. State-chartered institutions are permitted to withdraw upon majority vote of their shareholders, but must pay 3 years' additional premiums in event of withdrawal. The Insurance Corporation is authorized to make regulations for the safety of these insured institutions and may exclude any from the insurance fund in the event of a violation of such regulations, but in this case the existing accounts will remain insured for 5 years and the premium will continue for this period.

Adequate provision is made for the liquidation of insured institutions somewhat similar to the plan for the liquidation of banks which are under Federal deposit insurance.

The bill amends the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, section 10A, by making less rigorous requirements for collateral, so that members of the Federal home-loan banks may borrow money on better terms. Section 11 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act is also amended so as to authorize the issuance of consolidated Federal home-loan bank bonds or debentures in an effort to secure a form of security which will be more marketable. Sections 6 (c) and (e) of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act are amended so as to reduce the minimum membership for smaller associations in these banks from $1,500 to $500.

The Farm Credit Act of 1933 is amended so as to permit production credit associations to make loans on homes for improvements and to insure such advances with Home Credit Insurance Corporation.

The Federal Reserve Act is amended so as to permit national banks to make temporary loans not exceeding 6 months upon real estate to provide funds for building, and such loans, whether secured or not, may be treated as commercial paper, and in the event responsible arrangements have been made for permanent financing, such temporary paper is made eligible for discount as commercial paper at the Federal Reserve banks.

I shall not further attempt to explain in detail the provisions of the bill, but I shall leave that for members of the committee who will follow me and who are quite familiar with every provision of the bill and will be pleased to yield to gentlemen who desire to propound inquiries.

Let me say, in conclusion, your committee has labored in good faith, industriously, and conscientiously to consider properly the legislation submitted to us and which is covered by the bill now under consideration. I speak for every member of the committee when I say that at least in purpose we are all agreed, and we are in entire harmony with other Members of the House, whether or not they agree as to the methods employed to accomplish our purposes. All of us, I am sure, desire to go along with the superb leadership of the President in his efforts to point the way to a more abundant life and greater happiness for the people of the United States. We are all one in our desire to assist in the stupendous task that confronts this administration in the effort to restore normal economic conditions and prosperity for the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CAVICCHIA].

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the Membership of this House that no measure that has come before the Committee on Banking and Currency for the past 2 years has had such consideration and unanimity on the part of the Membership, including both parties, as the measure now before the House.

I come from the State of New Jersey, which has 1,000,000 members in building-and-loan associations. We have the largest per capita investment in building-and-loan associations of any State in the Union. Knowing the conditions as they are in my State, I am perfectly willing to have someone say that the building-and-loan association lobby exercised its influence on me to vote for the bill as reported out by the committee.

There is no difference of opinion as to title I that seeks to remodernize the homes of the home owners who can borrow up to $2,000 and the institution that lends the money can have that advancement insured up to 80 percent.

Title II as originally submitted to us provided for the creation of mortgage companies, no one of which could begin operations unless it had $5,000,000 capital, and Uncle Sam, if you please, would stand sponsor for the principal as well as the interest, which would put Uncle Sam into direct competition with private business. That was eliminated because in the opinion of the majority of the committee members savings banks and building-and-loan associations would have gone out of business.

In place of the section submitted to us we took the section suggested by one of your own Democratic Members, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK], which will give capital to buildinga-nd-loan associations so they can make direct loans and recast existing loans.

I received a letter from a man in Arlington, N.J., which says:

> Don't be easy with the building-and-loan associations, because yesterday I passed my own home which the building-and-loan association took away from me.

That man has a grudge against the building-and-loan association because it foreclosed and took away his home. You sympathize with that man, and so do I; but building-and-loan associations are cooperative associations, and that man must have been far behind in his payments and dues, so that the directors had nothing to do but to foreclose. If you put more money into the hands of the building-and-loan association, they will be able to take care of those in distress, such as the one who wrote me.

Mr. BRUNNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I yield.

Mr. BRUNNER. Will the building-and-loan associations loan money on the same basis as the Home Loan Corporation loans it now?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. The building-and-loan associations will go on with the work as they have been doing.

Mr. BRUNNER. But one is a 11-year proposition and the other is a 17-year proposition.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. They do not all work on the same plan.

Mr. BRUNNER. They will continue on the same plan that they always have been on?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Unless they want to amend their charter.

Mr. BRUNNER. Would the gentleman be willing to support a plan of that kind if offered as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. If it is not made obligatory.

Mr. BRUNNER. But it is no good unless it is obligatory.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. There are building-and-loan associations in certain districts which are getting along perfectly well under the old system. Why force them to take on 17-year mortgages?

Mr. BRUNNER. The point I make is that they have got millions of dollars out in my State, and I do not know what they have done with the money, but they have not loaned it out.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I will tell the gentleman what they have done with the money. They have had so many of these thrift accounts held by persons who lost their positions, who needed the money, that it has been taken out, and they have hundreds of thousands of dollars in mortgages that are actually frozen assets, because those who borrowed on the mortgages are not paying the interest and dues, or are only paying the interest, and that is why they cannot help anybody out.

Mr. BRUNNER. But this is a housing bill, and the money is supposed to be spent to house people, and to enable them to build new homes and to make repairs.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. This bill provides that whatever money goes to the building-and-loan associations shall go for two purposes, new construction and recasting of existing loans.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman states that the building-and-loan associations are paying out to certificate holders, that is news to a lot of them in the New York area.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. And it is news to me also. I mean to say this, that when they had money they paid it out, and now they have no money with which to take on new construction loans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They have adopted rules where a certificate holder would have to live for about 25 or 50 years——

Mr. CAVICCHIA. And this will do away with those rules. We had those in mind, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not understand that the Government is lending money for that purpose. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BRUNNER] asked if the building-and-loan associations when they get the money are going to loan it on mortgages, which they have not done today, and they have gotten nearly $500,000,000.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. They have got to put it out on new mortgages.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They have not put out what they have had to date.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. They have no money to put out.

Mr. WILLFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I must refuse to yield further.

The gentleman from New York mentioned slum clearances. I come from the metropolitan area, and I should like to see the slums cleared, but may I suggest to the gentleman from New York and to those who come from other large cities where slums exist that they go back and have their people do the same thing that the Prudential Insurance Co. did in my home town. That company spent millions and millions of dollars in slum clearances instead of having Uncle Sam supply the money and let the private corporations make the profit. I am acquainted with that section of New York that the gentleman from New York describes, lying between the Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridges. I will tell you who owns those houses that have been up for a hundred years, as the gentleman said. It is the Astor and the Vanderbilt estates and the Trinity Church Corporation which was given money to use for charitable purposes. It can use some of that money to clear the slums in the lower part of Manhattan Island without having the Federal Government guarantee these debentures. What city in the United States, with the exception of four or five, can start a corporation with $5,000,000 in the mortgage field? I can tell you who some of them were who put the bill together and presented it to us. There was a representative of the Johns-Manville Co., a material supply house, a representative of the General Motors Acceptance Co., and another from the General Electric Co., and they are all interested because they sell supplies.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. As soon as I finish. If you adopt the bill that has been presented to this House by the Banking and Currency Committee, these material supply houses will sell just as much goods under this plan and will save the building-and-loan companies and the mutual savings banks as much as they would have under the bill that they presented.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman has told us who put the original bill together. Will he tell us who tore the bill apart?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. The members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, which has presented the bill. We have made a workable bill out of it. Having in mind that putting men to work in the construction field was the primary aim of the administration.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Was there not a man from Chicago who had a lot to do with it?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. No. The gentleman from Chicago submitted a brief of many pages, suggesting changes, and we accepted two or three changes out of that brief.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. If the gentleman from New York considers that the constructive changes made by the Banking Committee constitute a tearing process, then I was one of them. We were trying to accomplish in a more effective way the true purposes involved in the President's program.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I am glad to say that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] deserves great credit for the helpful suggestions made in improving the bill while in committee.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. But I wish the gentleman would state to the House what in his opinion would be the potential liability of the United States Government if we restored the original title II and section 5, which would have permitted the Government to guarantee or insure mortgages, old and new, to an unlimited amount, with possible losses up into the billions? I want the House to clearly understand this.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New Jersey 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. The original title II provided for a capital of $200,000,000, that could have been extended five times, making it $1,000,000,000, but on orders of the President it could have been extended indefinitely; so that nobody knows how much we would have been voting by voting that blanket power.

I want to say this as a Republican. I have voted for every recovery measure that has come before us since President Roosevelt took office. I have tried to be nonpartisan, because I try to serve my country. I am still with you Democrats. If we should restore the bill as originally submitted to this committee and throw out the weeks and weeks of work we have done, you will do the country an irreparable injury.

Mr. WILLFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I yield.

Mr. WILLFORD. In the formation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the building-and-loan associations throughout the country immediately got together and refused to accept the bonds, only in cases which were top heavy.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. The gentleman does not blame them?

Mr. WILLFORD. Yes; I do.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. They were not guaranteed as to principal. They were guaranteed as to the interest but not as to principal.

Mr. WILLFORD. But they do not come with clean hands. They want to help themselves.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I beg to differ with the gentleman. The building-and-loan officers have got a duty to protect the people who have saved their pennies and gone there monthly and put them on their books. They had a right to protect those depositors. I differ with the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] 15 minutes.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask not to be interrupted, so that I can give in a short time a birdseye view of what the pending bill attempts to do.

It is generally recognized that what is known as the "heavy industry" is not functioning. Industries dealing with consumable goods have come back. In 1929 the building industry in this country amounted to about $11,000,000,000, of which sum between three and four billion dollars went into the building of new homes. In 1933, the building program of the Nation had shrunk to about $3,000,000,000, and today 90 percent of the men who used to use hammers and saws, lay bricks, and mix concrete and mortar as part of the building industry in our country are on the relief rolls.

The pending bill is intended to help revive the building industry in this country.

There has been some dispute as to whether or not there is any demand for construction of new homes. I might say that there are some 25 bills pending before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House that have for their purpose the putting of men to work in the building trades. A subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, of which I had the honor to be chairman, held hearings on these bills. From such hearings it would appear that the home-building demand in this country is spotted, that is, there is not a general demand. In certain sections of the country it would appear that there is a demand for the building of new homes, while in other sections such a demand does not exist. There is, however, a general country-wide opportunity for putting men to work in the painting, repairing, and remodeling of existing homes, homes of our citizens that are on the pay rolls of the country and have never been off of them during this panic.

Section 1 of the pending bill is the important and vital section of the bill, as regards the general purposes to be accomplished by this legislation.

Since 1929 there has been practically no painting, repairing, or modernizing of homes in this country. Millions of homes are in need of paint and minor repairs. A census recently taken by the Commerce Department shows that 40 percent of the homes of the country need paint, and that from 10 to 15 percent could stand repairs and modernization.

Title 1 of the pending bill sets up a new corporation to be managed by five men appointed by the President from existing governmental boards. These men are not to draw any extra salary because of the work performed on this new board. This new corporation is to be known as the "Home Credit Insurance Corporation." It is to have a capital stock of $200,000,000, with the right to issue bonds and debentures to five times that amount, or $1,000,000,000. This new corporation is to set up the machinery for the guaranteeing of money loaned to citizens to repair or remodel homes up to the amount of 20 percent of the sum loaned, and to insure mortgages on existing homes up to 60 percent of the present appraised value of the home and up to 80 percent of the value of newly constructed homes.

Now, why should the Government go into the business of guaranteeing to any extent money loaned by bankers or other financial institutions to a citizen to repair or remodel his home, and why should the Government be interested in insuring existing mortgages and mortgages placed on homes to be built? The answer is that the Government is interested, deeply interested, in providing work for the 5,000,000 mechanisc of the country who formerly found employment in the building industry, but who are now, and have been for some time, out of work.

Now as to the insuring of loans for repairs on homes to the amount of 20 percent. This provision means that where a banker or loaning institution advances money, we shall say, to the extent of $10,000 to citizens to repair or remodel their homes, the Government will stand not to exceed 20 percent of the total losses of the said loaning institution, sustained because of such loans made to put men to work.

Now these repair and remodeling loans that are made by loaning institutions are what might be called "character loans", loans that are to be made to citizens who have a good reputation for paying their debts, and who are on pay rolls and are willing and able to set aside a small sum each month to pay for the repairing or remodeling of their homes, in order to help out in the great problem of putting men to work.

Under the provisions of this bill, a citizen can borrow up to $2,000 to repair and remodel his home. He gives no mortgage, nothing but his note, and whether or not that note will be taken by the local lending corporation will depend entirely upon this citizen's reputation for paying his debts and upon his present situation as regards earning power.

The repair and remodeling idea of this bill, in order to be successful, will undoubtedly have to be popularized and advanced by methods similar to those pursued in the Liberty Loan drives and other drives designed to unite the efforts of a community, to accomplish a definite aim, in this instance to make work for the unemployed.

The belief is that there are millions of American citizens who own their homes, and can afford to spend money in the repair and remodeling of those homes, who will not make such expenditures in the coming year or two, unless they understand that it is and will be the general intention and purpose of all such citizens to join in a movement to spread employment through expenditures for the repair and remodeling of homes.

The most that the Government can lose by guaranteeing loans for repairs is $200,000,000 and such a loss could not be sustained unless $1,000,000,000 was expended in the repair and remodeling of homes, and 20 percent of the loans went bad.

It is maintained by the author of this bill—and I think justly—that the Government could well afford to spend $200,000,000 to get $1,000,000,000 worth of work done on our homes and that such expenditures of money would be more preferable than paying out such a sum for relief purposes.

It is not expected that the Government will sustain any such a loss. It is stated that many financial institutions in the past have loaned money, millions of dollars, to citizens purely on character loans for home repair and that their losses have never exceeded 2 percent.

Someone has asked why should the Government enter into the business of insuring mortgages, particularly on homes already constructed? The mortgage market is frozen; badly frozen. No matter how good a mortgage a citizen may have today, there is no selling it. If mortgages are insured there will be a sale for them, and it is contended by the authors of this legislation that the making of existing mortgages salable will aid in the reviving of the building industry.

The purpose of insuring mortgages on new homes is to make such mortgages salable, and thereby, through the turn-over of such mortgages, provide more money for the building of new homes. Under the terms of this section the Government cannot lose, because there is an extra 1 percent added to the interest rate that the borrower will have to pay on an insured mortgage, and it is claimed that experience has demonstrated that this extra 1 percent will leave the Government without any loss. While the borrower will pay this extra 1 percent, it is expected that he will get his loan at a lower rate of interest, and in the end will not have to pay any more than he would have paid if his mortgage was not insured.

There are two reasons why the building trades are lagging today as compared with former times. One is because the demand for new building has fallen off as a result of the depression and the other is because there is no capital available for building purposes. I say there is no capital available, and by that I do not mean that there is not plenty of money in this country, but what I do mean is that the people who have money do not care to invest it in the building business or in mortgages.

It is believed that this section of the bill will pour hundreds of millions of dollars into the building industry that otherwise would remain in hiding.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. This part of the original bill also provided for the guarantee of mortgages on low-cost housing projects. But that was stricken out by the committee, was it not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir; nobody seemed to be able to explain to the committee just what the phrase "low-cost housing projects" meant.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The gentleman said this would be more or less of a character loan.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Then, suppose a man has a home that already has a large mortgage on it, as large as it will stand, can he still borrow money?

Mr. REILLY. Whether or not this man can borrow money for repairs and remodeling will depend entirely upon his reputation for paying his debts and his earning capacity at the time.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. REILLY. It is a character loan.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. The only security given is his character?

Mr. REILLY. The elements which enter into the making of these loans are two, the reputation of the borrower for paying his debts and his present earning capacity and ability to make monthly payments on a bill for repairing or modernizing his home.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Is there any charge to be made by the Government for this guaranty?

Mr. REILLY. No; the Government stands the whole cost of operating the set-up for the guarantee of these loans for the repair of homes, and also whatever losses under the 20-percent guaranty limitation may be incurred. The Government is willing to pay the operating expenses of this set-up and to stand losses not to exceed $200,000,000 in order to provide a billion dollars' worth of work in the repairing and remodeling of homes, and thereby make work for the unemployed who otherwise must be fed through relief expenditures.

The important part of title 2 of the pending bill relates to the power given to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to advance money to the amount of $500,000,000 to building-and-loan associations, Federal-loan-association savings banks, savings associations, insurance companies that are engaged in the financing of new homes. The building-and-loan associations of the country constitute the backbone of the home-building set-up that we have. These associations have constructed more homes in the past 10 or 15 years than all the rest of the home-building associations put together.

Now, this money is to be loaned to these home-building associations for a term of not more than 5 years. The money is to be loaned through the purchasing of shares in the building-and-loan associations or loans to insurance companies engaged in this home-building work. Now, all of this $500,000,000 may never be used up. The idea is to give to the Federal Home Owners' Loan Corporation this sum of money that it will have on hand to loan to these home-building institutions for the building of new homes and for the repairing of homes. I take it that none of this money will go out unless the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is satisfied that it will be used for the purpose of creating employment.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is that restricted to new construction or to repairs?

Mr. REILLY. The law limits the use of this money for new construction, repairs, and also for the refinancing of loans already in existence.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Then, as I understand it, it is either for new construction or for repairs, but it must be for residential purposes occupied by the borrower.

Mr. REILLY. That is the intention of the law.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Suppose a man has a mortgage of $2,000 on his property and he wanted $2,000 for improvement; who will finance it under those circumstances?

Mr. REILLY. This improvement would be financed under section 1 of the bill through a local loaning institution. The man with a $2,000 mortgage on his home who desires to improve his home to the extent of $2,000 would apply to a bank or some other loaning institution for a loan to improve his home; and he would get the loan, undoubtedly, if he had a good reputation for paying his debts and if he was earning a salary or wage that would justify him in laying aside a certain sum every month to pay off his loan. After the loan was agreed to and the money advanced to complete the repairing of his home, the banker or the loaning agency could get this man's note guaranteed up to 20 percent of the amount loaned; and if the local banker made loans to the extent of $10,000 to different people for repairing their homes, the Government would protect the banker to the amount of $2,000. But, as I have stated, there is no expectation that the losses on these loans for the repair of the homes, based on good character and present earning capacity, will amount to anything near 20 percent, according to the judgment of men who have studied this method of loaning.

Title 3 of the pending bill provides for the organization of a Federal saving and loan insurance corporation, with a capital stock of $100,000,000 in bonds, provided by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. This corporation is to be under the control of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. The purpose of this corporation is to provide for the insuring of accounts not to exceed $2,500, in building-and-loan, saving-and-loan, homestead associations, and cooperative banks, whether the same are members of the Federal Home Loan Bank System or not.

This law has been made necessary by the insuring of bank deposits in this country up to $2,500 and, after July 1 next, up to $5,000. Notwithstanding the fact that these mutual institutions have a remarkable record for solvency and have stood up in many ways better than the banks, yet it would appear that the people are putting their money in banks instead of these cooperative home-building institutions, and the object of this legislation is to make the savings of the people, that may be put in these home-building institutions, just as safe as if they were placed in the banks of the country.

These home-loan institutions are thrift institutions, and, through the savings habit cultivated by such institutions, billions of dollars have been put into these cooperative institutions, and, as a result, millions of people have been able to acquire homes who otherwise would be renters.

[Here the gavel fell.]

[Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, this bill instead of being what might be inferred from its original designation is now called a home credit insurance corporation bill. Of course, it is in no sense a political measure. I had hoped from what was originally written about it, and from what the President wrote in reference to it, that the bill would be a humanitarian measure instead of setting up a new superbuilding association to be backed by the finances of the Government.

I know something about the building and the production of houses through these great house construction institutions, where they make a thousand houses a month and send them to New York to be put up. They send them from the Watsontown mill knocked down, and if they arrive there in the evening they can be put up in time to sleep in the house the same night. We have passed even that vision in this bill. We are overlooking, it seems to me, the poor soul who wants to refinance his home or build one.

I should like to see certain changes made in this bill. A gesture was made in the right direction, as I understand from a question propounded here in regard to the low-priced house. We talk about the environment of the youth of the land, and shaping the character of the boy and girl who are to be the future citizens and defenders of the country, the Members of Congress, if you please, some day. Yet we ride all over the country to our homes and pass shack after shack. We deplore the conditions for a moment, but move on and do nothing. Then we bring in a bill like this, which is some kind of a financial ramification without a thought of that poor, weak, unfortunate fellow who is living in one of these shacks and raising a family of children in an environment that could not possibly be conducive of character or morality.

I am reminded of what Marshal Joffre once said when an orderly rode up to him. They were all dug in somewhere around Verdun. The orderly said, "Marshal, with all this wonderful, modern equipment we have here, being dug in for 6 months without moving or doing anything else, what do you think Napoleon would do if he were here?" Joffre looked at him and said, "Orderly, I think if Napoleon were here he would think of something."

Now, we have done so much financing during this session of Congress that we seem obsessed with the idea of talking about billions of dollars. We could not even get this one by at $200,000,000. We had to multiply it five times and say, "We will make it a billion" in order to do something by way of financing financial institutions. The real thought that should have been uppermost in the minds of those considering this matter should have been to provide something for that poor soul in the shack. The gentleman from New York described his district—and I can see every street there—and what the gentleman says I can confirm.

However, throughout the country there are shacks, which is the term I wish to apply to them, unfit for human beings to inhabit; and these human beings are going to have a vote, and you want them to vote intelligently.

It is charged now that there is a certain element in this country that is increasing at the ratio of 9 to 3, and in two generations they are going to control and dominate in this country.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. SWEENEY. What is that element?

Mr. FOCHT. I am not discussing that phase of the matter. I will say a foreign element.

Mr. SWEENEY. Why not name the element? The gentleman casts an aspersion on some group in this country.

Mr. FOCHT. I am not casting any aspersion upon anybody. I am for the bill and I shall vote for it. We are not introducing that subject into this discussion, but I would welcome such a discussion with the gentleman whenever I may get the time. I can assure the gentleman about that and if he means that for a challenge, I shall accept it and welcome the opportunity.

However, here is my thought, and it is what I wrote about and what I sent to the President, who is not for this bill. I will say that much for our President, whom I happen to personally know. The purpose I have in mind is to reach down to the weak and unfortunate and help them as American citizens. [Applause.] This is what I want you to do and get out of spending the people's money for something which might be done in some other way through the building-and-loan associations. I do not have one in my district that I know of, and I am not influenced by them, but I have heard enough here to say that you are going to displace them, although they have been one of the most useful institutions in America.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Always to my good friend on the Immigration Committee.

Mr. SCHULTE. If this money is allotted and handled by the United States building-and-loan associations, does the gentleman think any of the little fellows down in the humble shacks will get any of it?

Mr. FOCHT. They will, if you do what Joffre said—think of something, but not otherwise. I am not on this committee. I might have thought of something myself if I had been, although I want to be modest in the matter.

Mr. SCHULTE. The message I am trying to convey is this: If this goes through the hands of the United States building-and-loan associations, the so-called "worker", the carpenter, the plumber, and all the rest of them, are not going to get their proportionate share of the funds even to the extent of doing a day's work. It is not going to simmer down to the little fellow whom the President wants to reach. Am I right or wrong about that?

Mr. FOCHT. I do not know. I only know that that may be characteristic of the Democrats in your neighborhood.

Mr. SCHULTE. And the Republicans in Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am sure the gentleman does not think that putting a front porch on a home or a frigidaire on a back porch is more important than slum eradication or providing proper, low-cost housing.

Mr. FOCHT. I am not considering that. It is optional with the man to borrow to build a new house or to repair an old one. What I have in mind is doing what is done in the District of Columbia. Where a house is 50 percent disintegrated, you cannot even repair it, and this is what I want to do with respect to these miserable places where there are now housed the children who are to be our citizens of the future, so that they may have sanitary surroundings, with homes of more than one room, so that all of them will not have to huddle in just one room. The gentleman knows what I mean.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That was in the bill, but the committee took it out.

Mr. FOCHT. And that shows a lack of wisdom. They are getting away from the humanitarian idea of the bill, which should have been the sole purpose of the measure.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The gentleman stated that a certain element in this country is increasing at a ratio of 9 to 3. I wonder if the gentleman had in mind, perhaps, in considering this ratio, tax-exempt bondholders?

Mr. FOCHT. I may say that we will find out who they are as soon as my chairman, Mr. DICKSTEIN, publishes a report of the hearings we had over there about the kind of people they are, and how they are going to dominate in this country in two or three generations if we are not watchful. As I have said, they are not to control the country as did Napoleon by sweeping the boulevards of Paris with his artillery; they are going to accept our challenge and walk up to the ballot box and outvote us. This is the way it is going to be done unless we properly take care of the children of the country, as we have an opportunity to do here today, and carefully enforce our immigration laws.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does not the gentleman think, under the bill as it appears before us now, and as amended, a great deal of the money that is to be made available and guaranteed by the Government, under the terms of the bill, will go to refinance old indebtedness, rather than to stimulate new construction?

Mr. FOCHT. It appears to me to resemble an old horse that is trotted out here to be given an inoculation of some kind with Government money. Ordinarily I would be opposed to it, and opposed to using it as an experiment. I am amazed that a committee composed of such excellent gentlemen, probably the flower of the talent of the House, would miss the main point and go back to the old financing scheme, just because they can spend money that has been accumulated over the years in this country through the progress of industry under the guidance of the great Republican Party.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for one-half my time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, at this stage, with a rule brought in here for the consideration of a very important bill such as this, and with the demand for time and the feeling before the Rules Committee that even 3 hours might not be adequate, does the gentleman really think he should speak out of order?

Mr. FISH. The only reason I make that request is that we do not have any further requests for time on our side beyond what has been allotted, and I am leaving today, and I should like to speak on several matters, and even to pay some compliments to members of the Democratic Party, including the gentleman's colleague from New York, Mr. PRALL.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I want to take this occasion—and I think it is in order under this bill—to pay tribute to a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency who has served many years in the House, who is about to leave us through appointment by the President of the United States. Before doing so I want, as the newest member of the committee, to pay tribute to the committee and to its chairman and members for reporting out some of the most important legislation that has passed the House during this session.

As one who feels very strongly that the House of Representatives, whether in control of the Democrats or Republicans, should legislate for themselves, I desire to commend the Committee on Banking and Currency for this particular bill. It is the right and duty of the President of the United States to recommend legislation to the Congress. I find no fault whatever; in fact, probably, I admire the Democrats for going along with the President on general principles, but it is not expected that the Congress under our representative form of government should permit some young fellows on the outside to hand you on a silver platter a complete bill, down to the most minute details, and ask you to take it without any consideration or without any change. Therefore, I am glad to commend this committee for holding extensive hearings, listening to both sides at length, and then finally in executive session accepting the principles as recommended by the President, but not every detail of the legislation, not the minutest details as suggested by some young theorists who have had no experience whatever. The Committee on Banking and Currency has written a constructive, workable bill. I feel if there is any criticism of the House at all in the past, it is that during the first part of the session all that was necessary to say was, "This is an administration measure", and every committee reported it out just as it was written, probably written by some young fellows, perfectly nice young fellows, but without any practical experience. I am not even saying they are radical. There are in this House today on every committee, whether Democrats or Republicans, men of legislative experience, men who have gained that experience in this House through 10 to 20 years of hard work.

The same rule applies to members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Therefore, when this bill came before them they accepted the general principles and tried to write a workable bill to provide employment for the building trades, which is the hardest hit of any industry in America. It will help create jobs for the bricklayer, carpenter, painter, plumber, and a host of others, including factory and mill workers. That is what this bill does. It is not a perfect bill. You could not write a perfect bill of that kind even if you stayed in session 2 months longer. But it was written from the wisdom and experience of such men as the senior Members on the Democratic side and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY], on our side. That is why I am willing to go along on this legislation and vote for it as it is.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is the gentleman against the Federal Government's taking an interest in slum clearance?

Mr. FISH. No. But the gentleman will have plenty of time to discuss that. We heard both sides of that issue.

Now, I want to take this occasion to at least express my views and pay tribute to one of my colleages from New York [Mr. PRALL], who has served in this House for many, many years, and who is, through training and ability, one of the most experienced and one of the most useful Members of the House of Representatives. [Applause.] We dislike to see him go, to leave this field where he has spent so many useful years in shaping legislation even by appointment of the President to serve on the new board in charge of Federal communications. He has been a credit to his party; he has been a credit to the State of New York, and he has been a credit to the House of Representatives. He will take to that important commission experience and knowledge in public affairs and something that we all learn in the House of Representatives, and that is, the necessity under our representative form of government of protecting the rights of the minority.

Although on both sides we are partisan, there is something that we can learn only here, and that is that the minority side, the opposition, has rights that must be preserved. In the closing days of the session, of course, in order to expedite legislation, certain gag rules may be put through and may be called vicious; but they are apt to be used by both parties in like emergencies. I should like to make this observation: At this time the minority has only 115 Members, whereas the majority has something like 312; yet outside of the operation of the gag rules, which might possibly be criticized as being destructive of what we call "representative government", we have equal rights with the Members of the majority. We have had equal time in debate on measures, we have had equal time to present our side of any question, although we had but 115 Members and you had 312.

I am making just a little plea, a little indirect plea, that our friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL], when he goes on the new Commission on Communications, will remember that the same rule should apply there, as the people back home have the right under our democratic system of government to hear both sides of all great issues over the radio. The Commission should allow the facts to be presented so the people can decide for themselves, and I hope that Commissioner Prall will take that precedent, long and wisely established in the Congress, to the new Commission on Communications and give the people a chance to hear important issues discussed from all points of view.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Is it a brief question?

Mr. MAY. It is. I take it from his last remarks that the gentleman from New York is opposed to the gag rule applying to the Communications Commission.

Mr. FISH. I am opposed to all gag rules, whether proposed by my side or the other side; but that is another matter we have not time to discuss here.

I want also to pay a tribute to a young Republican member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, a new Member who, due to certain local conditions, was defeated in the primary election out near Chicago a short time ago; I refer to JAMES SIMPSON, Jr., Representative from Illinois. I regret exceedingly that he or any other young man with his background should be defeated. What we need on both sides of this aisle in Congress is some young men, and particularly young men of his type, who can devote their entire lives to public service, for it takes time and experience to learn the rules of the House, and this is the greatest training school in the world, where young men can become valuable legislators through hard work and their own efforts.

JAMES SIMPSON, Jr., represents one of the most courageous types of young men in America. He won the second championship as the best jockey in the United States. And I want to tell you my colleagues who have been in athletics, that it takes "guts"; it takes more courage than anything else to be a real jockey. He broke his neck at one time, and he broke his back at another, yet he is alive to serve his country. I trust that he will not leave here discouraged. I want him to go back home and take part in the politics in his State or come back here; and I hope he will aspire as did another great jockey in America, to be Vice President of the United States. While Vice President Curtis was a good jockey, he never was in the class of JAMES SIMPSON, Jr., when it came to winning races.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The gentleman stated that what we need in Congress is young men. I readily agree with that assertion; but I would modify it by saying that we should have young men of liberal thoughts. I refer especially to my opponent at the last election, who had studied political government for 27 years and who was a graduate of Harvard. It took only 6 months of the new deal to convince him that all he had learned in his prior lifetime was of no avail. He is now a new dealer. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am informed I have 2½ minutes left. I hope no one will object if I talk out of order for two and a half minutes, although I do not know that in two and a half minutes I can express my views on the matter about which I shall speak.

I was one of those Republicans who supported the N.R.A.—and most of us did—because the country was in an emergency, because we thought it was the right thing to do, to put our country above our party. In order to help relieve unemployment and bring about recovery we voted for it, voted for it knowingly, willingly, and gladly. As one who voted for it, I think a most unfortunate thing happened the other day when Gen. Hugh Johnson attacked not only ex-President Hoover in a slighting and unjustified manner and commented derisively on the choice of Henry P. Fletcher, but denounced Republicans as pirates and bitterly assailed the Republican platform made out in Chicago. He called it a "herring, a dead herring that smells and has nothing in it."

Now, if you are going to inject politics into the N.R.A., the N.R.A. will become a dead herring and there will be nothing left of it. It ought to be, and must be if it is to be continued, nonpolitical and nonpartisan. None of us on the minority side have attacked General Johnson or the N.R.A. We do oppose its being made permanent; we do oppose the use of coercion, force, and compulsion—we did not vote for that at all. But if the head of the N.R.A. is going to make these violent attacks—bitter, partisan attacks—then the N.R.A. ceases to be nonpartisan and becomes merely an adjunct of the Democratic Party.

While I was out at Chicago at the national committee meeting, advocating a liberal platform, which is denounced now as a sham by the head of the N.R.A., and as a dead herring, what was the Congress of the United States doing? All that you did in the House was to pass a census bill to provide 103,000 jobs for deserving Democrats; and I say to you, if that reference by General Johnson holds, that our Republican social program is a dead herring, that census bill that you passed last week is a dead mackerel that shines and stinks and stinks and shines in the moonlight.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry, but I have not time.

Mr. MAY. I just want to call attention to the fact that in reciting the attacks made by General Johnson the gentleman overlooked General Johnson's attack on the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from New York can take care of himself.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the title of this legislation is the "National Housing, Employment, and Insurance Act." It is a matter of common knowledge that activity in durable-goods industries of the country has lagged; that many artisans formerly engaged in the building trades are still unemployed; and that millions of homes are hanging in the balance, their owners threatened with foreclosure and eviction. This measure is intended to invite, tempt, and, if possible, induce private capital into the building and construction field and into the real-estate mortgage markets, and thereby stimulate the building trades, furnish employment to labor, and enable home owners to build homes, or renovate, repair, and improve existing homes, and also enable them to finance such projects upon fair and reasonable terms.

In addition to certain liberalizing amendments to existing laws, this act may be divided into three main parts. In the first place, it sets up a Home Credit Insurance Corporation, whose board of directors shall consist of not less than 5 nor more than 7 members selected from already existing boards, commissions, or executive departments of the Government. The Corporation shall have a capital of $200,000,000, subscribed for by the Treasury of the United States. In order to obtain the funds with which to carry out the provisions of the act in providing insurance and in making loans and advances, the Corporation is authorized to issue notes and debentures which are unconditionally guaranteed, both as to principal and interest, by the Government.

The Corporation may in general engage in two kinds or classes of insurance. It may insure financial institutions, such as banks, insurance companies, and finance corporations against loss on account of loans and advances made by such concerns to real-estate owners for the purpose of making alterations, improvements, and repairs to real estate. This insurance is limited to loans not in excess of $2,000, and is also limited to 20 percent of the total amount of such loans carried by any such lending institution. It is expected that these loans will be made by various financial institutions to home owners and others who desire to make improvements, and whose income and financial responsibility are such as to give reasonable assurance that the obligation will be paid when due, but who, under present conditions, cannot borrow the money. By means of this insurance, private capital will loosen up and be willing to enter the field and the much-needed renovation and improvements of many homes will be accomplished, thereby preserving the property and at the same time furnishing employment to many. This insurance is confined to obligations made for the above purpose and which are entered into after the effective date of this law and prior to January 1, 1936. The obligations under this class of insurance may be secured or unsecured and shall conform to such credit standards, forms, and terms as the insurance board shall prescribe. This class of insurance is limited to $1,000,000,000 of obligations and the Corporation's total liability is limited to $200,000,000. The Corporation may make loans and advances to insured institutions upon the security of obligations to which the insurance applies. This is the part of the bill which it is expected will give immediate impetus to home repair and renovation.

The second feature of the insurance company's activities is the insurance of amortized mortgages on existing homes and on new ones to be constructed. In this case the individual mortgage is insured for its full face value, but no mortgage given on an existing home for more than 60 percent of its appraised value and 80 percent of the value of new structures shall be insured, and no mortgage on property of an appraised valuation of over $20,000 shall be insured. A mortgage to be eligible for insurance must be amortized and must be upon homes within the above limitations. The details of the plan, the form of the mortgage, the interest and premium rates to be paid, the appraisals and service charges are left to the rules and regulations of the board.

It is hoped that mortgage money may be had for the home owner that will not cost him in excess of a total maximum of 6 percent where it is now all the way from 8 percent up. Within the next year or two, millions of home mortgages are coming due. Many institutions and individuals will want and will need their money. The mortgagors cannot meet their maturing obligations. Private investment and trust funds, as distinguished from public money, must be induced, if possible, to enter the picture. Many holders of maturing mortgages would be willing to extend the payment and amortize the mortgage over a longer period of time and upon more favorable terms to the home owner if he were sure in the long run that his mortgage would be paid. The Government insurance gives him this guaranty. In that way there is a security given to the holder of the mortgage which will prevent foreclosure and the consequent further depression of the mortgage market, and also result in a saving to the mortgagor in reduced interest rates. Those who must have their money on matured mortgages will be given an opportunity to remodel or amortize the obligation in accordance with the rules of the Insurance Corporation, and then be able to place the mortgage on the market and receive the cash for it. There are plenty of private funds to finance the real-estate securities market when it is known that those securities are insured by the Government. That, in itself, will give them more or less liquidity and lead to investments in them when it is realized by the investor that he can dispose of these securities in case of need. It is the purpose of this part of the bill to unfreeze, thaw out, liquefy real-estate mortgages and to make them an attractive investment for private capital. This will not only result in much good to the commercial banks and trust estates throughout the country but will bring permanent and lasting benefits to the home owners of the Nation.

The second part of this bill proposes to furnish additional funds to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and to the building and loan and savings institutions of the country, so that those organizations and institutions will have resources with which to relieve and help the needy home owners. Under existing law, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has authority to issue bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000, which are guaranteed by the Government. The proposal here is to increase the amount of bonds which this Corporation may issue to $3,500,000,000, and not to exceed $500,000,000 of this amount may be invested, deposited, or loaned to building and loan associations, savings banks, and insurance companies under certain limitations and restrictions. The funds thus furnished shall be used by these institutions in supplying capital for the construction, renovation, and improvement of homes, as well as for the refinancing of existing mortgages in the interest of home owners. None of these funds shall be used by the institutions to which they are advanced for the purpose of paying off any of their depositors or investors or to meet any other creditor obligations. The building and loan associations hold about one-third in amount of the home mortgages of the country and about two-thirds in number. The total home-mortgage indebtedness is about $21,000,000,000, of which amount the building and loan associations hold almost $7,000,000,000. Of the 10½ million home mortgages, the building-and-loan associations hold between six and seven million. Next in importance in home-mortgage holdings are individual money lenders, who hold $4,000,000,000 of such mortgages. By placing more funds at the disposal of the savings and loan associations, it will relieve them of the present strain and enable them to provide more money for the construction and repair of homes and also enable them to refinance many of their present mortgage holdings on terms more favorable to the home owners.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation has done wonderful work during the time it has been in operation. This Corporation was created a year ago, and, in setting up the machinery for its operation, the Home Loan Bank Board has established offices and branch offices and placed in charge of them managers of the Corporation in every State. Up to date over $850,000,000 have been loaned to over 275,000 home owners. Almost a million and a half applications have been received, amounting to over four and one-half billion dollars, and these applications are now being received at the rate of over 100,000 per month, and the average loan closed amounts to about $3,000. It is thus seen that there are already on file applications for loans in an amount more than twice the available funds of the Corporation. At the present rate the bonds and cash of the Corporation would be exhausted before Congress meets again. Hence, if the loan activities of this Corporation are to continue, there arises the necessity for the authorization contained in this bill that the Corporation may issue $1,000,000,000 more in bonds. Needy and distressed home owners in every county in the United States have been relieved and saved by this Corporation, and its activities must not cease at this time.

The third feature of this measure provides for the insurance of building-and-loan and savings-and-loan institutions. This plan is analogous to the bank-deposit insurance provided at the last session. The insurance corporation shall have a capital of $100,000,000, subscribed and paid for by bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and shall be managed by the Home Loan Bank Board. All Federal savings-and-loan associations and all building-and-loan, savings-and-loan, and homestead associations and cooperative banks organized and operated according to the laws of the State, District, or Territory in which they are chartered shall be eligible to insure their accounts and be admitted to insurance upon an examination and approval by the Board, whether such institutions are members of the Federal Home Loan Bank System or not. No account shall be insured for more than $2,500. Each insured institution shall pay an annual insurance premium at the rate of one-half of 1 percent of all its accounts until a reserve shall have been built up in the insurance corporation to a total of 5 percent of all insured accounts, plus other creditor obligations of all insured institutions. In addition, the Corporation may assess an annual premium of one-fourth of 1 percent on all accounts in each insured institution to meet losses and expenses.

An insured institution may withdraw from the insurance upon a majority vote of its stockholders, and its insurance rights will terminate immediately, but its obligation to pay premiums shall continue for 3 years. When an insured institution is in default the insurance corporation may be, and in case of the default of a Federal savings and loan association shall be, appointed as conservator or receiver and manage the assets to the best interests of the shareholders therein. In the event of default on the part of an insured institution, all parties having insured accounts may receive 10 percent of their account in cash and 50 percent of the remainder in 1 year and the balance within 3 years from date. The insured member may receive a new insured account in an insured institution not in default or cash and non-interest-bearing debentures of the insurance corporation for the balance. Since bank deposits have been insured, it seems desirable to insure the accounts in savings and loan associations in order that savings and investments may be encouraged and more money be made available for the use in building and renovating homes. There runs through this entire act a plea for the home owner. The central thought is the improvement and the protection of the home. There are countless numbers throughout the Nation who in happier and more prosperous times bought or built a home with the hope and expectation of having a place in which to rear a family and enjoy the comforts and peace of home life in their declining years and who now, because of misfortune or adverse economic conditions, are about to lose all. To all those this measure offers full and immediate relief. Over, above, and beyond the great and serious problems of unemployment and emergency relief is the preservation of the American home as a permanent institution. The home is not only the unit of community and national life, it is the very foundation of civilization. This act is designed to lift the pall and scatter the clouds that have hovered over millions of home, bringing fear and and despair to men, women, and children in recent years. It is important to give aid to agriculture, commerce, and industry, but it is imperative that the home be saved. If the thought of owning a home is destroyed, we have gone far along the road toward disintegration. The ownership of a home is the dream and the aspiration of everyone, and this ambition should not be thwarted because the future hope and perpetuity of our great country depend upon the peace and contentment that cluster around the firesides of its millions of humble homes. This measure will help bring that peace and contentment and should be passed at once. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if memory serves me correctly, I recall that in the course of the discussion on the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation bill, in the spring of last year, there was no single allusion on this floor by any Member that ultimately there might be a stagnation in the mortgage-financing market, and yet that seems to be precisely what has happened.

Insurance of deposits in banks, together with the encouragement of deposits in Federal postal savings banks, has brought approximately $13,000,000,000 into the banks under provisions of the insurance act, together with eight billion in postal savings deposits. The result, therefore, is that the potential market for mortgage financing funds has been entirely drained.

I never heard a single Member of the House in the deliberation on that bill ever imply or point out the possible danger of building up a great reservoir of reserve credit which would become stagnant and immobile, and could not be touched, and therefore it becomes necessary now for additional legislation in the form of what is called the housing bill, to cut a hole in that dam and let out the fluid to stimulate employment in this country.

I do not believe there is any difference of opinion as to the need for a housing bill. The only difference is as to the approach, as to how best to effectuate that purpose, and so when I see the statement in the newspapers by the very able, sincere, and hard-working president of the American Federation of Labor that we have been dismembering the administration housing bill, I am pretty sure Mr. Green has not had time to examine all the various ramifications of the provisions of this bill.

And when I hear a distinguished individual who wears a patch over his eye, who has hunted headlines in all corners of the world, who gets a fine stipend from the Johns-Manville Co. for presenting an argument over the National Broadcasting System, stating that the minute the President leaves Washington Congress begins to cut up didos and dismembers the housing bill, I am satisfied that those things were put into his hands in manuscript form, and that he has not read the bill. Everybody is agreed on housing and repair needs. There is, however, a sincere difference of opinion on the method.

Now, they talk about the propaganda of the building-and-loan associations. I served 3 years as a director of a building-and-loan association, where as a director I received $100 a year for going out 12 or 15 times a year, in fair weather and foul, with a list of applications for loans, spending days in examining the value of real estate and the value of structures for the purpose of making loans.

There are 11,000 such building-and-loan associations. They have aggregate assets of seven and three-quarter billion dollars. If you spent a billion dollars under this bill, it will be only 14 percent of what building-and-loan associations have invested in real-estate mortgages at the present time.

Since 1926 there have been only 700 or 800 building-and-loan associations that have failed for an aggregate of $70,000,000. That is the kind of record that would put all the bankers in the country to shame, and I think the Nation and the people and the Members of Congress and all those identified with government ought to be humbly grateful for the part that the building-and-loan associations had played in stemming the further ravages of the depression.

There has been some talk about building-and-loan associations as an instrumentality of propaganda on the bill. Who are they? The directors and officers simply hold positions of public trust, terribly underpaid, if you please, representing almost 11,000,000 shareholders. And when you multiply that by the family factor to arrive at the number of families in the country represented, it represents over one-half of all the people of the United States.

Then I say to you, Who has a better right than the building-and-loan associations of the country to come here and express their opinion on a housing bill when it comes up before Congress, in the hope that no prejudicial legislation will be enacted that may make an inroad upon the integrity of this great mortgage structure that is owned by 11,000,000 people? The fact that shareholders put their money into building-and-loan associations makes them depositors, but it also gives them an equitable interest in every mortgage that the building-and-loan associations puts upon the recorder's books of the county in which they operate, and when they talk to you about propaganda of these associations I say I am only too glad that they are sending telegrams and writing letters and manifesting a profound interest in the people for whom they exercise a trust and whose money they are administering in a trust. Building-and-loan associations are the people. Also I am grateful that they are here and have been able to appear before committees and give their version of the matter. Building-and-loan associations have been opposed to title II, and why?

Title II in the old bill provided for a set-up of mortgage associations with a capital of $5,000,000. That will not do my district any good. The largest town in my district has 105,000 people. It is doubtful if we could secure $5,000,000 with which to establish such an association. For the most part, they would have to be identified with the money centers like New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, and other cities of the country. That means that small towns and moderate-sized cities can be served only by remote financing. Secondly, those mortgage associations would have the right to issue 15 times their capital stock in bonds and debentures. Think of it! They incorporate for $5,000,000 and issue stock, and then there is conferred upon them the broad authority to issue $75,000,000 in bonds and debentures. What for? With which to go out and play in the mortgage-financing market. How short our memories are! Think of the trouble created by a company like Strauss & Co., which, when it went into a tailspin, left a path of desolation and despair, left widows and orphans clutching paper that was not worth the green ink with which it was written.

I for one will never be a party to setting up mortgage associations with authority to write 15 times their capital in bonds and debentures and give them the benefit and privilege of putting out this paper free from virtually all Federal taxation, such as inheritance, income, and gift taxes, and then letting them offer it in this great field, virtually guaranteeing their paper and putting the seal of official Federal approval upon a private corporation. It has the potentialities for plunging us back to the depths from which we are now emerging.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Can the gentleman justify an argument against title II and at the same time not do anything about repealing the Federal Reserve Act?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not entering into those collateral matters. They have nothing to do with this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. What is the attitude of the building-and-loan associations toward title III, the insurance, and why?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think from what I have heard of Mr. Bodfish's testimony, and what I have read in the hearings before the Senate committee, that they are more or less in favor of that insurance, if it is to be, and in favor of the insurance of the savings in building-and-loan associations. They are willing to go along with that provision.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to answer that question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. The building-and-loan associations are not wholly in sympathy with that section.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But they will go along with it.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Yes; and the committee is of opinion that once we have tried, the succeeding Congress might make a change in it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Before my time expires there is one other observation I want to make, and this is inspired by the testimony given before the Senate committee by Mr. Stewart, of Texas, a man who out of great universal experience in the field of real estate, title, and building insurance, and impelled by profound sincerity, gave illuminating testimony. He stated that perhaps one of the fine things that could be done would be the total elimination of undesirable housing before we go too far into the field of constructive housing. I can elaborate in a very tangible and definite way by giving you some figures I gained from the recent C.W.A. census figures that are based on the city of Decatur, Ill., a semi-industrial city, where they have a total of 14,662 dwellings, of which 991, or about 7 percent, are vacant.

Now, they have about 206 dwellings there that are uninhabitable. It seems to me that in many instances some of this money will presumably be expended upon dwellings that are perfectly unsanitary, uninhabitable, and after you have expended the maximum that is permitted under the housing bill, you still have not done a constructive job. The result is that you will have standing there, eyesores of all kinds, these slatternly structures that defy all efforts of any city planning commission or any zoning commission to bring order out of chaos in the life of a community. It is too bad that in that bill they could not write a provision that for every new structure that is erected they must tear down one of these eyesores which dot the landscape in every hamlet, village, and city of the country, and which for some peculiar reason humankind is reluctant to destroy and efface from the landscape. Why not destroy two birds with one stone? If for every new building constructed under this bill, one ancient, uninhabitable building could be torn down, ultimately that would not only serve the cause of housing but the cause of sanitation, fire prevention, and beauty just as well. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it is very seldom that my eloquent friend from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] puts himself in a position where he is subject to correction. However, the gentleman told you that under the provisions of title II of the act which I will designate, for convenience, as the "original act", the act in the suggested form in which it came to our committee as the result of the work of months by housing experts, that one of these national mortgage associations could issue its bonds or debentures to the extent of 15 times the amount of its capital stock. The gentleman's statement is literally correct, but he failed to tell you that there is another limitation upon the amount of bonds or debentures that may be issued by one of these national mortgage associations.

It is further limited by (b) of section 207 of original title II, to the current value of the mortgages held by it, and insured under the provisions of the National Housing Act, plus the amount of cash and its equivalent and the bonds or obligations of the United States which it holds. That is a further limitation on the amount of bonds and debentures which a national mortgage association, under the provisions of original title II, may issue.

I find myself in a rather peculiar position—a position peculiar to me not only with respect to the brief time I have served in this body but almost unique in my experience. I feel that I may be called guilty of presumptuousness or conceit in disagreeing not only with the minority members of my committee but with a majority of the majority members of my own committee. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], a man for whose ability and useful service and industry I have the greatest respect, and who has been very helpful to me in my work on this committee, brought out the fact that there were four of us who disagreed with this report, or who, in effect, disagreed with this report. I am one of those four. I represent a very small minority in this committee. I have a hard choice to make, because for the first time in my experience here and in the work of the committee, which I have very much enjoyed, I feel obliged, through my judgment, which may be imperfect, but still through such judgment as I have and through my conscience, to disagree with several men to whom I have looked for counsel and guidance; but according to my judgment and conscience, while it is a hard choice for me to make, I should feel obliged, if I were compelled to make that choice, to vote against this bill in its present form and take the chance of trying to get something better rather than to allow it to pass in its present form.

This bill may be better than nothing. It probably is better than nothing; but it falls so far short of the plans of the administration and the purposes of the bill which was originally presented to us, after housing experts had worked on the matter for months, and after that work was ruthlessly thrust aside by this committee; it falls so far short of realizing the hopes and aspirations for permanent recovery on the part of the people of this country, that, I say, rather than pass this bill in its present form, I would have it defeated, and take the chance of getting something better from the body at the other end of the Capitol.

The suggested bill came to the committee as the result of the work of months by experts in the housing problem, as a measure which was intended to provide a means for the insurance of mortgages, the insurance of shares of building and loan associations, and other similar associations, to provide for the insurance of loans for the modernization of homes and for repairs, and to provide for improving the housing and living conditions of people in the larger cities, through low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects. It was intended to call out idle capital and put men to work in constructive, creative effort, that would mean both an addition to the permanent wealth of the country and an improvement in the living conditions of our people, and that would create more employment than any of the so-called "emergency measures", or all of them put together, in the judgment of the men who have testified before both committees, both the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in its hearings and the House Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. Can the gentleman tell the amount of money that this bill calls for? Is there any limit that can be used for the refinancing of existing mortgages?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; there is a limit.

Mr. BLOOM. What is the limit, may I ask?

Mr. SISSON. An authorization of $200,000,000 is made for the Home Credit Insurance Corporation; and I may say that as far as that feature of the bill is concerned, I am in favor of it.

Mr. BLOOM. But $3,500,000,000, if the gentleman will yield, is called for in this bill. If the money is to be used for refinancing existing mortgages, there are about $4,000,000,000 of existing mortgages that are in default at the present time, mortgages that are owned by the loaning institutions and the life-insurance companies of this country. Now, if there is no limit to the amount of money that can be used in the refinancing of existing mortgages, then this $3,500,000,000 can be used in refinancing and paying off the insurance companies, and there will be nothing left for new housing or for the alterations or renovations of old houses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I think I can explain the matter to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This $3,500,000,000 contains $1,000,000,000 as an addition to that which has been already provided to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. This $1,000,000,000 would still be used by that Corporation.

Mr. BLOOM. Yes; but this is for rebuilding and refinancing existing mortgages.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is talking about the provision which authorizes the Corporation to make loans——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further.

Two vital features have been taken out of this bill. Another provision has been inserted in the bill which to my mind is unnecessary at the present time and which constitutes an unnecessary appropriation of money from the Treasury.

Title II of the original bill contained a provision creating national mortgage associations. This was needed. Important functions will be performed by these associations. First, the provision of adequate financial facilities for limited-dividend corporations engaged in low-cost housing projects such as are associated with slum-clearance projects; and, second, to secure liquidity of the mortgage market. Several of our large industrial States have already passed laws granting certain exemptions and privileges for local cost-housing projects, provided they are placed under adequate public supervision. The New York Housing Authority is one of them and the Federal Housing Corporation is another. These organizations are now attempting to deal with the problem of providing better low-cost housing for the industrial workers in our large cities.

Under the provision allowing the creation of national mortgage associations, such an association must have a capital of at least $5,000,000 and it is under the most rigid supervision. An association of this kind is the only device, the only mechanism, which can adequately deal with slum clearance or low-cost housing in our large cities.

A moment ago the gentleman from Illinois said that this would be of no benefit to his district. Because I have a great deal of admiration for the gentleman, I am rather surprised that he would base an argument against the bill on such a reason. I do not know that it would be of any benefit to my congressional district either. However, I represent not only my congressional district, but I represent also the city of New York, the city of Chicago, the city of St. Louis, and all the other cities of the country; because every man in this body represents, in theory, and should in practice, the people of the United States.

The mortgages that would be discounted by national mortgage associations must be amortized mortgages and must be insured in accordance with the provisions of this act. Under title II as it was originally written, these associations would have operated under very strict limitations. They would be chartered, supervised, and examined by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board; and they would be compelled to satisfy that Board that they were in a position to service the insured mortgages held by them. The limitations placed upon them would insure their soundness, and they would not be subject to the expense of renewal, or the risk of failure of renewal, of short-time loans. They would be large institutions. They would be so limited in number as to be subject to careful individual supervision. In my opinion that was one of the vital features of the administration bill as it came to our committee.

Mr. Chairman, there are in the savings deposits in the banks of this country upward of $21,000,000,000, and most of this money is lying idle. On the other hand, there is very little mortgage money available. The function of the national mortgage associations, large associations, probably only a few in number, would be to constitute reservoirs where mortgages taken by other institutions, amortized under the provisions of this act, insured under the provisions of this act, under the most rigid supervision, could be discounted and thereby the money that is lying available scattered all over this country, savings deposits in the banks, could be made available to those communities where there is a need of building construction, of home improvement, of mortgage money, of slum clearance, if you please. I do not represent any district where there is any need of slum clearance, I am happy to say; but there are other Members here who do; and that, if you will pardon me, is where a large part of our indirect sources of revenue lies. I think these people are entitled to some consideration.

A suggested bill came to the committee as the result of the work of months of experts in the housing problem which was intended to provide means by the insurance of mortgages, by the insurance of shares of building-and-loan associations and of similar thrift associations, providing for the insurance of loans for modernization of homes, and for repairs of homes, and for improving the housing conditions of people in the larger cities through low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects; a measure intended to call out idle capital and to put men to work in constructive work, in work that would really mean both an addition to the permanent wealth of the country and an improvement in the living conditions of our people.

The House Banking and Currency Committee emasculated this bill. It took out two of the vital parts of this bill and substituted therefor another part which is, I believe, unnecessary at the present time, and which constitutes an unnecessary appropriation of money from the Treasury. Title II of the original bill contained a provision for national mortgage associations. It was intended that two main functions would be performed by these associations: First, the provision of adequate financial facilities for limited-dividend and similar low-cost housing projects such as are associated with slum-clearance projects; and second, to secure liquidity in the mortgage market. Several of the large industrial States have passed laws granting certain exemptions and privileges for low-cost housing projects, provided they are constructed and maintained under public supervision. The New York Housing Authority and the Federal Emergency Housing Corporation are now working out certain attempts to deal with the problem of providing better housing at low cost for the industrial workers in our large cities.

These national mortgage associations are the only bodies which will have the resources to handle and service at low cost first mortgages for these projects in large individual amounts. Such mortgages must be amortized and insured in accordance with the provisions of this act, and under title II as it was originally written these national mortgage associations would be operated under very strict limitations. They would also be required to have a minimum in capital of $5,000,000 and their debentures would be limited to a maximum of 15 times their capital.

These national mortgage associations would raise their funds in centers where capital is the most reasonable and where there is the largest amount of money in bank deposits, savings deposits, now available for mortgage money and building construction which is now lying idle. They would therefore be in a position to make lower-cost money available for home-loan financing. By their very terms they would be confined to conservative financial operation. They would not be subject to stock-selling promotional abuses.

One of the most valuable witnesses who testified before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in the hearings upon the real bill—a bill that contained the vital and did not obtain the objectionable feature that this bill contains—was Mr. Charles A. Miller, former president of the Savings Bank of Utica, N.Y., and now president of the New York State Savings Bank Association, and a former head of the R.F.C. The mortgage experience in the city of Utica has probably been better than that of 90 percent of the cities in this country, due largely to the influence of Mr. Miller in bringing it about that home-building in that city has been generally financed by amortized mortgages rather than straight mortgages, and mortgages so amortized that the home loaners were able advantageously to pay up the mortgages and pay for their homes.

Mr. Miller stated that he regarded the national mortgage associations as of the utmost importance in this bill. Without these mortgage associations he said that you would not be able to draw upon the tremendous reservoirs of uninvested funds, the owners of which are waiting around anxiously hoping for a chance to get them back where they will produce a reasonable rate of income, while in the meantime they are realizing practically no income at all. This money is scattered throughout the United States. The national mortgage associations would provide a means whereby mortgages already taken by other institutions, amortized in accordance with the safeguards set up in this bill and insured in accordance with the provisions of this bill would find a market and thereby there would be released in the areas where there was a demand for mortgage money, where the demand for mortgage money exceeded the supply, further funds for home building and home improvement.

There is far less difficulty of supervision of these national mortgage associations than there is in the supervision of a large number of small institutions and there is a minimum of risk. It should be noted also that no expense is entailed upon the Government and that no appropriation or allocation of funds from the Treasury is necessary for this provision.

In place of title II which made provision for these national mortgage associations the present bill provides, among other things, in present title II for the furnishing of $500,000,000 to building and loan associations and other savings institutions through the agency of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. I think the building-and-loan associations are very desirable institutions, but it seems to me that we have done enough for them in this bill in insuring their mortgages and in insuring their shares. Hundreds of millions of dollars already have been provided for them.

I am opposed to this bill because of the inclusion of present title II.

I am also opposed to the present bill because of the fact that without any good reason therefore, the provision for low-cost housing and slum-clearance projects was cut out of the bill. The opponents of this provision say that it has no proper place in the bill. The reason is that they cannot label or mentally pigeonhole it under any of the labels with which they are familiar. All of these projects of which I speak carry themselves, and they carry themselves by enlisting private capital, by drawing out private money, and by aiding private enterprise. They do it without the appropriation of any additional money by the Government. This does not involve lending by the Government at all, as in the case of other emergency laws. It will put more men to work and furnish more permanent improvement, create more permanent wealth than any of our emergency measures, and it will do it in a permanent and constructive manner. The 8- or 9-percent mortgage money lenders are among those who appeared before our committee and were in favor of taking the heart out of this bill, and there are a lot of them left in the country. The owners of old tenements, of high-rental cheap tenements, oppose this provision in the bill.

This is a problem of distribution, of taking the money from the places where it is now lying idle and putting it to work in permanent construction where it will furnish employment. There are 10,000,000 of unemployed men, it is true, but there are 40,000,000 of men employed in this country and of these 40,000,000 there are at least 20,000,000 who can afford to improve their homes if the payments could be spread over a period of time. The home-owner and home-modernization features of this bill are excellent, but no provision is made for improving the condition of the workers in large cities where the people live in cheap, unsanitary tenements by providing low-cost small units for them in which to live. If we can have a bill which will create these national mortgage associations—which are the only means by which a ready market can be provided for the discount of mortgages and for the financing of slum clearance projects—we shall help get these ten millions of men to work, and when we get these ten millions of men to work we shall increase the incomes of the other 40,000,000 of workers.

I want to read into the RECORD a few letters out of hundreds which I have received in favor of the original bill and in opposition to the emasculated product which is before us today.

Re: House bill H.R. 9620
Congressman FRED J. SISSON,
Member of House Banking and Currency Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

SIR: A short time ago I wrote a letter to President Roosevelt as per the enclosed copy.

I understand now there is an effort on foot to either defeat the above bill or cut out section 5 of title 1, which provides for insurance of mortgages, and also cut out title 2. A bill passed with these things cut out will be of very little value in restoring the building industry in this country.

Tomorrow, owing to the depression, I will have this plant sold out from under me and will probably lose my life's work; but there are others who will have to follow on, and let us make it safe for them as we possibly can.

I trust that my expectations that you will take care of this matter will come true.

Yours respectfully,

W. G. PALMER.

Hon. FRED J. SISSON,
Whitesboro, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: It is our understanding that the national housing bill (S. 3603, H.R. 9620) is being delayed in the House Banking and Currency Committee. We understand further that you are a member of this committee.

From my study of this national housing bill I am convinced it is one of the most constructive measures yet proposed for recovery, because of the fact that through lack of available financing the tremendous amount of new construction and repair work which have been accumulating during the past few years is even now practically at a standstill.

Undoubtedly, you fully appreciate how far-reaching the benefits of building construction are. It is not merely the carpenter, mason, and building-material man, and the comparatively few mechanics directly involved in this work that benefit. It produces business and employment back as far as the mines and forests and for the numerous manufacturing plants furnishing household equipment.

It seems to me that the features of the bill pertaining to mortgage associations, long-term payments, and low interest rates are perfectly sound. Had the existing loan organizations followed a similar course of amortizing over the past 20 years, their losses on mortgage foreclosures during this depression would have been minimized greatly. If the benefits of the bill are to be trimmed in amendments which will curtail its effectiveness, a great opportunity for stimulating recovery will be lost.

I urge you to give this matter your support in its entirety.

Yours truly,

BEACH LUMBER CO.,
S. H. BEACH, Jr., President.

Senate bill 3603—House bill 9620

THE SUBURBAN LUMBER CO.,
Cleveland, June 6, 1934.

Hon. FRED J. SISSON,
Member House Banking and Currency Committee,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SIR: It has come to my attention that objections have been raised to the administration's proposed housing finance measure, based on the theory that there is plenty of first-mortgage money available for real estate financing, but it is being withheld on account of high costs of materials.

This ridiculous objection should be easily seen through when the source of it is considered. If there is plenty of mortgage money for first mortgages, then why is it impossible for a prospective home owner to borrow as little as $1,000 on a first mortgage to complete the financing of a home costing $3,500, when he has the balance in cash and his land clear?

I sincerely believe that the big reason is that the groups opposing this legislation are only interested in keeping a stranglehold on the racket that makes the would-be home owner pay through the nose if he needs any money to finance his home.

Six-percent, 7-percent, and 8-percent money plus a bonus for home financing is too high a premium for the home owner to pay for the privilege of owning his own home, and the fear that 5 percent and 4 percent, which, to my mind, are all that any home owner should pay on money borrowed for home building, would cut in on this racket is the reason for this opposition.

If proper judgment had been used in the past in the financing of home building, surely there would never have been the deluge of distressed home owners that have been so wonderfully helped by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation at this time.

What this one administration agency has already accomplished should be the answer to "Why the need of the present legislation?" You do not see any of the financial institutions of this country refusing the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and they do not pay 6, 7, or 8 percent interest plus a bonus either, but they are a safe investment, and so would be the mortgage loans made under the proposed legislation.

Cost of materials used in the construction of homes has nothing whatever to do with the withholding of first-mortgage money at this time.

We are experiencing no difficulty whatever in selling our lumber at present prices to owners who do not need to borrow money for their construction needs, and those who do need to borrow have never yet questioned our prices, as we can prove to them that the price we ask is justified by the services we are equipped to render in addition to the quality of merchandise furnished. They are only held out of the market because they cannot get the money their security entitles them to borrow, and that fact is another contribution to continued unemployment in the building trades.

It is very evident that the "money changers", which our President referred to in his inaugural address, do not propose to "take it lying down", and will hesitate at nothing to hinder the President in his plans to bring a lasting prosperity to our country, a prosperity based on the greatest good to the greatest number.

I plead with you to permit no changes in the legislation as proposed by the administration, as I am sure we can safely "go along with Roosevelt."

Sincerely,

THE SUBURBAN LUMBER CO.,
H. C. HAAG, President.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks five letters out of several hundred I have received from various parts of the country urging that title II of the original bill should be retained in this bill and urging the retention in this bill of other vital features of the original bill, and opposing the objectionable features of the bill which I have indicated in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELTSE].

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Chairman, I shall direct my remarks entirely to section 105 of the bill, which happens to be the one in which the building-and-loan associations of the United States are particularly interested and with which they are vitally concerned. I sincerely trust that the Members of the House will do me the courtesy, while I am making an attempt to explain this from the point of view of the building-and-loan associations, to listen closely. I will admit I am not a very able advocate of the cause, but I will attempt to do the very best I can.

Prefatory to what I shall have to say, it is my understanding that the building-and-loan associations throughout the land are not opposed to this bill as a whole, as brought in by the committee, but they are opposed to section 105, and at this point, in order that we may get a basis for a starting point, may I read a telegram which I received from the Secretary of the California Building Loan League Association. The telegram reads as follows:

California Building Loan League representing 97 percent building-and-loan business this State, with more than 500,000 investors, 100,000 borrowers, and $350,000,000 assets vitally interested National Housing Act, House bill 9620. Request full discussion and record vote on striking out mortgage-insurance section. Insurance of mortgages unsound in principle, failure wherever tried, even on reasonably conservative lending basis, and will inevitably cost the Government a lot of money and the ownership of a lot of real estate. Proponents this section admit experimental.

Let us turn for a moment to this section in order that we may have an understanding of this matter and analyze the same. The Home Credit Insurance Corporation is authorized to insure amortized mortgages and like liens on owner-occupied homes when presented by financial institutions approved in accordance with section 103 of this title.

These mortgages fall into two classes. If you will read on down through the section you will see that one class of mortgage consists of those on new construction and on which the amortized mortgage may be insured to 80 percent of the appraised value. This is on new construction. The second class of mortgage covered by this section has to do with mortgages on existing homes, in which the amortized mortgage may be to the extent of 60 percent of the appraised value.

It is just a little difficult for me to understand why there should be such a wide difference between the amount of the mortgage on new construction and the amount of mortgage on old construction. It is submitted by the building-and-loan associations that this section is unsound, and with this point of view I agree. I shall try to express the reasons for my belief, which I understand to be the reasons advanced by the building-and-loan associations for their assertion that this section is unsound.

It is to be noted that this section will embark the Government directly into guaranteeing these two classes of mortgage and, as indicated in the telegram from Mr. Davis, secretary of the California Building Loan League, which I have read, they believe it to be unsound. Under our California law, for example—and I take this to be the case under the laws of many other States of the Union—the building-and-loan associations, banks, and other State corporations or institutions, cannot loan to the extent of 80 percent of the appraised value of property. So that if this bill passes in its present form with permission to loan to the extent of 80 percent of the appraised value on new construction, it will mean that the building-and-loan associations in various States of the Union, and particularly the building-and-loan associations of the State of California, will be required to go to the State legislature and get an enabling act to permit them to put themselves in the position where they can come in and take advantage of the insurance provisions of section 105 insuring amortized mortgages. In other words, the amount of the mortgage which is permitted under that section to be insured is entirely too heavy and would preclude the making of loans of the building-and-loan associations. We say the same thing with respect to the other class of mortgage, namely the 60-percent class.

It is a fact that the building-and-loan associations of California, the banks, and other lending institutions, have already gotten themselves into trouble and difficulty by reason of the fact that heretofore they have loaned on property to the extent of 60 percent of the appraised value; so we are going to be confronted with the same thing in the future, unless there is a rapid rise in the market value of properties. Should there happen to be a shrinkage in the market value of the property, the building-and-loan associations will be confronted with the same conditions which they have been confronted with in the past few years.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELTSE of California. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Does the gentleman realize if anything should happen to section 105 we might as well go back to title 2 of the bill which the administration submitted to us, and which was knocked out of this bill? The building-and-loan associations are willing to go along with the section as written, feeling that if it needs revision another Congress may revise it, as has been the case with revisions which have taken place in the R.F.C. and the Home Loan Acts.

Mr. ELTSE of California. May I say to the gentleman that the California building-and-loan associations are not willing to go along with section 105 in this bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELTSE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman think there is any excuse in a bill of this kind, which is intended to stimulate the building of homes, to provide for loans which may be in the nature of refinancing of existing obligations? Should not a measure of this kind concern itself with its primary purpose, which is to stimulate home building and improve employment conditions?

Mr. ELTSE of California. Yes; I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELTSE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I have heard the statement made here several times today that the building-and-loan associations are willing to go along with section 105 and not with title 2. Is the final test of this legislation to be placed on whether or not the building-and-loan associations will go along with us? Can we not go on without them?

Mr. ELTSE of California. I do not think we have to take our program from the building-and-loan associations; but may I say that we are also vitally concerned in not causing further bankruptcy of building-and-loan associations, and we should not pass legislation here which would seriously jeopardize their position. We all know that the building-and-loan associations and the State-lending institutions of the various States throughout the land have been seriously harassed and are having difficulty in getting by and to keep from closing their doors. The millions of investing depositors in these building-and-loan associations have to be protected also. We have those investors to think about as well, and this is something with which we must concern ourselves.

There is one other feature I wish to discuss and which was brought out by certain representatives of the building-and-loan associations I have talked with and which I also see as a danger in this section 105.

This bill, if passed, will centralize more power and more authority here in Washington. For the moment, may I contrast that situation with the situation which occurred in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation? If you have had any practical experience with clients of yours or with constituents of yours, you know they have had tremendous difficulty in obtaining loans through the H.O.L.C., and one reason they have had such tremendous difficulty is because the machinery has been so cumbersome. They have had to appeal to the local branches of the H.O.L.C., and then to the Regional Board, and from the Regional Board to the central authority here in Washington, and I know of several cases in my district where as many as three appraisements were made on property before the loan was finally passed, and in every event the appraisement in each instance was cut down, which proved very much to the detriment and disadvantage of the party making the application for the loan. The supervision, the inspection, the control, and the appraisement under this section are going to be centered here in Washington, and this is going to cause a slowing up of the machinery and a reaching out by the Federal Government to control the normal function or activity of investment in our local communities.

In this connection, I also want to point out that one of the purposes or the principal purpose of this bill is to stimulate the building industry and put more men and women to work or to create greater employment, and also in doing this to keep down the interest rates on these loans.

If the interest rates are kept down on these loans, it is going to operate to the disadvantage of the building-and-loan associations and other lending activities; and what will result will be this—and I want you to mark it: If the building-and-loan associations and the local investing corporations are not going to be permitted to go along very much as they have been under the regulation of the State in which they are organized and the interest rates are cut down, it is going to mean that in the big financial centers, like New York and Chicago and San Francisco and Los Angeles, you will find springing up other corporations which can afford to lend at a lower rate of interest than the building-and-loan associations or these other lending activities of which I have spoken. This being the case, there will not only be centralization and control so far as the administration of this act is concerned here in Washington, but there is going to be a centralization of investments in the large financial centers. There will be centralization in two different directions, centralization of the administrative features and centralization of the investments; and there will be set up in the financial centers different organizations that will control this insurance of the amortized mortgages.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. ELTSE of California. That is one of the other principal dangers I see in section 105.

One other feature I wish to discuss for a moment and to which I want to call your attention under section 105 is that the amortized mortgages which this Corporation is authorized to insure under the 80-percent clause amounts to $1,000,000,000, and the amortized mortgages which this corporation is authorized to insure under the 60-percent clause is another $1,000,000,000. In other words, this Corporation will insure amortized mortgages under this act to the extent of $2,000,000,000, which creates another debt burden on the Federal Government, which, added to all the other debts of the Federal Government, results in a stupendous and staggering figure which makes our heads reel; and I submit that when we create such terrific obligation, this obligation, added to the others that already exist, is sufficient to cause us to pause and give serious thought about the creation of such great obligations as these on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELTSE of California. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has pointed out two serious defects in the bill. Does the gentleman propose to offer amendments at the proper time?

Mr. ELTSE of California. When the proper time comes I propose to offer an amendment to strike out section 105.

Mr. McFADDEN. And that amendment will cover the points the gentleman has raised with respect to the California situation?

Mr. ELTSE of California. There is still another point which the gentleman spoke about in his remarks under the rule and to which I expect to address myself when it comes to reading the bill under the 5-minute rule, which has to do with a provision on page 61, in a subsequent section. I do not have the time to cover that at this time.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that this section 105 is really a section to which we should devote very careful attention and consideration. I feel I have rather poorly expressed the objections to it, but it is the section to which you should give very careful consideration, and it is the section to which the building-and-loan associations take particular exception, and I wish to say in this connection that what I have stated is not said as an advocate for the building-and-loan associations, but because I feel that this is a section which does require the careful consideration of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Eighteen minutes on each side.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I should be less than frank if I did not state at the outset that I myself do not thoroughly understand the probable effect of some of the provisions of the bill now under consideration, known as the "National Housing Act." Though the committee, under the circumstances and within the short time allotted for consideration, has made a diligent, honest and sincere effort to bring to the House a safe and sound measure which will effectively carry out the true purposes of this legislation, as defined in the title, it cannot by any means be called a well thought out and completely studied measure. It has been ably presented by members of the committee, and the presentation made by my friend and colleague on the committee, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Missouri, was as clear and concise as could be made in a short speech here on the floor. His discussion of the three titles to the bill was almost a perfect birdseye picture of what this measure undertakes to do and the way in which it is to be done. It was an excellent presentation. The committee's chief purpose has been, in the consideration of this measure as it has in others, to present to the House a sane, sound and workable piece of legislation which would serve quickly and effectively in the success of the administration's program.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. May I finish a brief, general statement, and then I will be glad to yield?

In its larger aspects this measure, we are informed, is designed to bring about new and better homes for the new America under the new deal. By attacking the problem from many angles, it is quite evident that the big objective is to stampede private capital into action by loans for Nation-wide housing standards, and the employment of labor so essential therein.

The ideal involved is that of bringing the Nation's dwellings up to date to meet a social and economic challenge. A hurried trip through the average small town or city in America makes one wonder if it has been greed or luck that planned this ugly civilization. You wonder if a child could have done worse in planning it. You will wonder further where our billions of annual income have gone and why with all our natural wealth and materials the innate urge to have a real home has been thwarted in the case of so many deserving American families. The housing situation in this country amounts to an indictment of our whole civilization. The fact is that only the fortunate few of the 34,000,000 or so families we now have, including only a small percentage of our wage-earning families, have managed to acquire, or in some instances during normal times to even rent real homes. By real homes I mean homes reasonably conducive to safe, sanitary, healthful, convenient, and wholesome living rather than living quarters occupied by a family. I know that no structure can of itself make a real home in its true sense. But what percentage of the homes in America are located in desirable neighborhoods, readily accessible to work, schools, and playgrounds? My information is that not one-fourth have running water, and not one-half have electricity. Many of us know that not one-half of our families own the homes in which they live, and hardly half of this half own their homes outright. What is the reason for this, and how can it be remedied? My information is that housing costs American families more in proportion to income than in any other civilized country.

The reason for this appears to be that housing is still an adjunct of old-time land speculation, with appraisal and taxation of property made on a speculative value rather than, as in other countries, on its income worth. Another reason is—and this legislation undertakes to reform it—that in many cases the home owner has suffered from high-cost, sometimes extortionate, financing, with its mortgage and other rackets. Interest and brokerage rates have also made home ownership almost an impossibility to the person of small means and income.

This hurried description gives you a preliminary glimpse of our housing problem and one which has gravely concerned the administration from the beginning. It is truly a challenge to America. Through proper legislation we have hope of two accomplishments: First, in the long run, to make America a land of real homes; second, and more immediate, at once to utilize and capitalize this need to energize our heavy- or durable-goods industries in order to provide all possible of our good people who are idle with prompt employment. This hope is supremely important. It has been stated that the main difference between depression and prosperity turns largely upon the rate of production in our heavy industries, notably our building industry, which for more than 2 years has been flat on its back but is still living.

Now let us consider hurriedly the three main sections of the bill, in their proper order.

Title I deals primarily with the renovizing program and the guaranty of mortgages under section 105, both of which have been clearly presented by Mr. WILLIAMS and other members of the committee. I feel that the repair and modernization program will develop substantial employment in the building trades and stimulate the flow and cooperation of private capital and develop normal activity in local thrift and home-financing institutions.

The committee very properly amended the original act so as to insure only such financial institutions as are subject to inspection and regulation under the banking or similar laws of the United States, including the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as may apply for credit insurance and be approved. The only serious objection I entertain now regarding this title is that the interest rate is not limited. An effort was made in the committee to limit all charges, including interest, insurance, legal cost, recording fees, and other pertinent charges, to a maximum rate of 8 percent, in the hope that the actual interest rate would not exceed 5 percent. As I understand it, under the provisions of this section, any person having a legal or equitable interest in real estate would be eligible to apply to an approved institution for discount of his loan for improving such real estate. Any financing institution in the United States that could comply with the requirements of the Corporation would be eligible to have its renovizing or modernization accounts insured. Under title I these institutions are extended an additional privilege. In the event that they need to liquidate some of these loans, the Corporation may lend to them an amount equal to 100 percent of their loans made for these purposes. Under section 105 of title I the Corporation is authorized to insure amortized mortgages on homes on a mutual basis under regulations to be prescribed by the Corporation. In the case of mortgages on existing homes, the same to be eligible for insurance must not exceed 60 percent of the appraised value of the property; and in the case of mortgages built after this act takes effect, the same shall not exceed 80 percent of the appraised value of the property. No mortgage is to be insured under this plan if the same is against property appraised at more than $20,000. This provision harmonizes with similar provisions in the Home Loan Bank Act and Home Owners' Loan Act.

The total amount of mortgages against existing homes which may be insured is limited to five times the capital of the Corporation, and the total amount of mortgages against new homes which may be insured is limited to five times the capital of the Corporation, which in the aggregate amounts to $2,000,000,000. Serious opposition developed in our committee with respect to the advisability and wisdom of section 105. It embarks the Federal Government directly into the guaranteeing of mortgages, resale of foreclosed real estate, and might ultimately, according to the view and judgment of some of us; destroy the local mortgage-lending activities of savings-and-loan associations, homestead associations, cooperative banks, mutual savings banks, Federal savings-and-loan associations, and the like. Substantial time would be required to establish this program, and it seems to be at cross-purposes with the present Home Loan Bank System and the whole program for establishing and encouraging Federal savings-and-loan associations in addition to the 11,000 existing local building-and-loan associations. Some of the evidence presented to our committee was to the effect that under such an arrangement there could be little, if any, stimulation of building activities, and especially since the home owner would have to make arrangements to finance his building before such mortgage could be insured. It was also the belief of some that it was calculated to frighten and discourage private capital in local institutions and thereby defeat the very purpose for which it might be designed. Though it is limited to $2,000,000,000 in this bill, its insuring powers will no doubt be extended at the next session of Congress and in the long run will involve the Government in underwriting the entire urban mortgage business of the country.

In order to accomplish the same purpose, some of us believed that the Government could make safe advances through existing institutions, on condition that the money be reloaned, and arrange that they will receive a return of principal plus sufficient income for debt service, rather than to embark upon a highly dangerous, experimental plan which would probably involve a liability on the part of the Government to a colossal figure in the form of repossessed real estate and the bonded indebtedness in refunding it for the insurance corporation. If you think such a plan is a safe and sane policy for the Government to adopt, it is up to you to say so when the bill is read for amendments.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes; I am glad to yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I should like to get this question in the RECORD. In the bank guaranty bill, the Banking and Currency Committee provided that banks should only pay 3-percent interest. I should like to know why the committee could not put a provision in this bill absolutely limiting the interest which a bank may charge, thus preventing these private institutions from taking money away from the poor people.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Limiting the interest on loans to be made under that section?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. By which institution?

Mr. HOEPPEL. By any lending institution whose loans might be guaranteed under this bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The consensus of opinion among the members of the committee, based upon the expert testimony presented to us, was to the effect that a uniform interest rate was impractical and that it could not be worked out. Conditions vary in different sections of the country, and the rate of interest on loans is somewhat dependent upon the type of security offered. I personally tried to have an amendment made in the committee with respect to the small renovizing loans not to exceed a gross charge of 8 percent, which would include interest and insurance fee and all other proper costs. Interest by itself would not exceed a maximum of 5 percent.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Eight percent? Why, that is usury.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Not interest rate, but all charges, as I have just stated. I have consistently fought for a lower interest rate on obligations of home owners ever since legislation of this kind made its appearance before our committee. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the question was raised here this morning, an insurance company or an existing mortgage company that may hold mortgages now may have those mortgages refinanced through this Corporation, the Home Credit Insurance Corporation; may they not?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is my understanding, provided the institution is approved by the board of directors of the Corporation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Might it not occur that some of these mortgages that are held now are not as secure as they should be, and the owners of the mortgages are forced to care for the property they now hold; and it might be that they would unload these properties onto the Government Corporation?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is possible, of course, and perhaps probable, and it constitutes one of the serious dangers involved in this legislation. I may say, however, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that under this bill, as with nearly every other measure that we pass, its fair, proper, and effective administration, with adequate protection to the Government and the taxpayers, will depend upon the character, financial experience, and executive ability of those charged with the responsibility. Under the section which the gentleman has in mind, the mortgages would of course have to be first reappraised and revalued, and nothing but an amortized mortgage designed to make the payments on the part of the mortgagor easier would be eligible for insurance. We should not forget that one of the purposes of this legislation is to get rid of the so-called "second-mortgage" grafting schemes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] this morning pointed out the uses to which this Corporation might be put in financing installment payments. I notice in section III, installment-lending companies are covered in this; and, for instance, the General Motors Co. might want to finance their agreements for the sale of Frigidaires, and they could be financed under section III.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Any financial institution in the United States, as I understand it, which can meet the requirements of the Home Credit Insurance Corporation and become an approved institution, is eligible for insurance of its loans made under this section and for the purposes therein expressed. The language, to me, is very clear.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mortgages insured under this act will have the United States Government back of them, and will be just as good as Government bonds, will they not?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes; they should be solvent investments.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Why should they bear a higher rate of interest than Government bonds?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. One is a direct obligation and the other is an indirect obligation.

Now in the time left for discussion of the bill, let me briefly address myself to title II, which I moved in the committee to be incorporated in the bill after the original title II providing for the establishment of national mortgage associations was voted out. This new title II was overwhelmingly adopted last week, and on yesterday the committee by an overwhelming vote refused to instruct the committee to offer an amendment striking it from the bill. It was offered by me and adopted by the committee in perfect good faith. I thought it would greatly strengthen the bill and aid its true purposes. I have never known, to this hour, whether the President looked with favor upon this title or not. I have never heard from him about it directly or indirectly. My conception of a committee is that it should have a hand in forming and perfecting legislation. It should certainly not be insulted by an administrative officer in one of the departments because it does not carry out to the letter his wishes. Ours is one duty and his is another.

It is, of course, desirable that the views of the department that will administer a bill be harmonized with the views of the committee which must write and prepare such a bill. I recollect that during this session the President himself, in one of his great messages, suggested that it was our duty to work out and perfect legislation. If this were not true, why should we conduct hearings and give long-drawn-out and exhaustive study to the various proposals which come before us? To go further, why should we be here working day and night? If a man, after careful thought and studious effort, reaches a conviction but will not express it and support it by his vote, he might as well never have one. My desire is always to cooperate with the leadership, but I cannot do this if the legislation does violence to an honest conviction.

I might also add here that I have never heard of the criticism which was hurled against the bill by the president of the American Federation of Labor, whose judgment in matters of legislation is usually sound, until I read the account of it in the newspapers.

I might also explain here that I was one member of the committee who expressed a favorable view toward permitting mortgages incurred for slum clearances to be insured by the Corporation. I appreciate and sympathize with the horrible and unspeakable housing conditions in some of our big cities, and I would lend my best assistance always to secure a riddance of these conditions.

Title II of the bill before us is the amendment which I proposed. Its purpose is clearly expressed in section 5½ (a) and should hardly need any further elaboration. In order to provide for advances for construction and repair and to contribute to the early employment of labor in the construction, repair, and improvement of homes and small business properties, the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 is amended so as to authorize the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to provide funds for Federal savings-and-loan associations, building-and-loan associations and savings banks, and insurance companies, so as to enable them to make such advances for these purposes and for the further purpose of refinancing existing mortgages.

The method provided for the making of such advances is by the purchase of shares in the associations or the purchase of certificates of deposit in the banks or loans to insurance companies, and the funds are to be returned at the end of 5 years at a rate not exceeding 10 percent in any one year. An interest rate of 3 percent is provided for on such loans or advances. Five hundred million dollars is earmarked, so to speak, to cover this part of the program, and a billion dollars is further provided to increase the resources of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for refinancing mortgages of distressed home owners. If you are interested in assisting and protecting the small-home owner, you cannot do it in a better way than under the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the home-loan bank system. Notwithstanding some of the evils that have crept into the administration of this organization, and particularly the delay which has been caused by excessive bolts of red tape, these institutions are doing a great work, and the borrower through this plan gets a longer time with a lower rate of interest.

Under title III of the bill a Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is created, with a capital of $100,000,000 in bonds provided by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to be under the management of the members of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, with the usual power given to emergency corporations to employ and incur expenses. This insurance corporation is authorized to insure accounts not exceeding $2,500 in building-and-loan, savings-and-loan, homestead associations, and cooperative banks, whether the same are members of a Federal home-loan bank or not.

Such associations are insured only after proper application and examination, and they are required to pay an annual premium equivalent to one-half of 1 percent of the total amount in the accounts of all insured members, plus their creditor obligations, until such premiums build up a reserve in the insurance corporation equivalent to 5 percent of all insured accounts. The institutions are also subject to an additional assessment in the event that it is necessary to cover losses. This insurance, except in the case of Federal savings-and-loan associations, is voluntary and will become effective only if such associations apply for it and are accepted. Provision is also made for withdrawal of institutions under proper regulations which will require continuation of the insurance premium under rules prescribed by the Corporation. There is, among the other amendments offered in the bill, one which I proposed, appearing as section 404 on page 75. Sections 6–c and 6–E of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act are amended so as to reduce the minimum membership for smaller associations in these banks from $1,500 to $500. This is both desirable and necessary, and was adopted by the committee unanimously.

In conclusion, let me say this: There has been some rather acrimonious discussion here today regarding the committee's action in striking out title II of the original bill which authorized the chartering by the National Government of mortgage companies with a minimum capital requirement of $5,000,000. Personally, I seriously doubted the wisdom of permitting the setting up of this type of agency and giving it governmental sanction. We know that under these organizations the home owner has suffered grief and loss, as have the investors in their securities.

A description of the operations of some of these companies would but add another dark page to the story of the financial tragedies of the past few years. Giving them preferred status in the way of taxation exemption and other special considerations would, in the opinion of many able economists and financial experts, bring about the quick destruction of the true home-financing and thrift institutions. It would tend further to centralize this character of lending here in Washington, to the great detriment of many local communities. I would not question the motives or the purpose of mortgage reform involved in this plan of home financing. It is my judgment, however, that the chief purpose sought to be accomplished can be better accomplished through the administration of new title II in the bill before us today. I further believe that the building trades and industries will receive greater stimulation under title II of the present bill than they would have under title II of the old bill. Several of the administration's witnesses appearing before the committee stated that these mortgage companies would not be able to finance any new construction until practically all of the old mortgages had been refinanced and insured. Even after that, it was the opinion of several that trading in the mortgages would not commence until they had been amortized down to a much lower percentage than the amount for which they had been insured.

It has also been noised about the floor today that there was a big building-and-loan lobby here trying to thwart the plans of the administration. That statement is unfair and untrue, if my information is correct. I know of no such lobby. I do know that the building-and-loan associations, through their national organization, have repeatedly stated that they favored three-fourths of the administration's plans. There is a young man in Washington who has given years of thought and study to the question of home-ownership, home financing, and land planning as associate professor of economics and real estate at Northwestern University. This young man has a splendid record of achievement behind him. Few men are better informed than he is on real-estate subjects. His judgment has proven sound, and he is a man of demonstrated probity. In 1932 he was one of the Democrats appointed by President Hoover to serve on the first board of directors of the Federal Home Loan Bank System. At that time he was one of the youngest executives ever to fill an important governmental office. I am referring to Morton Bodfish, who is today executive vice president of the United States Building and Loan League located in Chicago.

Title II of this bill was worked out in collaboration with Mr. Bodfish, and so far as I know he is the only representative of the building-and-loan associations who has taken any part in the fabrication of this legislation. He very likely has consulted others interested in the organization which he represents. He has appeared before our committee and before the Senate committee, and I believe the membership of both committees have appreciated his valuable and constructive suggestions.

May I refer again to title III of the bill, dealing with insurance of building-and-loan shares. This is absolutely essential today for this reason. As long as you are guaranteeing deposits in banks, and as long as postal-savings accounts are protected, you must guarantee the shares of stock in building-and-loan associations; otherwise, the assets of building-and-loan associations would be drained dry. The competition with other guaranteed institutions would be grossly unfair and work a destruction to these worthy institutions.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. THOM. What the gentleman says is exactly true—that until building-and-loan companies have insurance of their deposits there will be no incentive to take deposits into building-and-loan companies. In the case of a bank, as soon as it is closed there is immediate settlement. In the case of a building-and-loan company, settlement by the insurance corporation will be spread over a year or two. Now, what is the inducement to a man to take his deposits to a building-and-loan company when he knows that if he takes them into the ordinary commercial bank he can get prompt payment in case of the failure of that bank?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The difference is just this—you charge the building-and-loan share-owner a higher proportionate amount for his insurance because the funds are not supposed to be available except upon notice. The difference is really between the liquidity of your bank deposit and the solvency of building-and-loan shares.

Mr. THOM. Let me see if the gentleman understands my question correctly. Suppose I am a depositor with some money to take to a bank. I know this commercial bank, if it fails, will pay me within 30 days thereafter. Over here is a building-and-loan company; and in case it fails, it would not pay me for perhaps a year or more. Now, in that situation, I will prefer the commercial bank.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The difference is that with respect to the deposit in the bank you would draw, under the present law, not in excess of 3-percent interest; whereas, with respect to building-and-loan shares, the interest rate runs from 4 to 5 percent. Here comes into play the difference of interest rates between long- and short-term investments.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I sincerely hope that we can pass this bill without further prolonged and unnecessary discussion and send it on its way to the other side of the Capitol. Though its effectiveness will depend largely upon its administration, I hope that with the amendments which have been made by our committee it is sound and workable and will contribute tremendously to the accomplishment of the fine social and economic purposes underlying its conception by our great President. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON].

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I have been following this legislation for some time. In fact, I was one of a delegation of five or six Congressmen who called on the President several months ago to interest him in the idea of stimulating business and employment by starting a home-building program. It seems to me that of all the efforts to get the stalled economic machine moving by the use of public funds, this is the most effective and, from the standpoint of the taxpayer, most economical. When Uncle Sam spends money for a courthouse or post-office building that he does not need, he finds that it is not the first cost that counts but the upkeep. He has to pay interest on the money, hire janitors, and keep the building in repairs. It would not be safe to assume that there will be no losses in the administration of this measure, but it is reasonable to believe that the losses will be smaller than they would be if the same amount were invested in public works. The borrowers, or most of them, will make their amortization payments and pay taxes on the houses they build. Every dollar invested in private construction adds to the amount of taxable property; every dollar invested in public buildings subtracts. The building of 100,000 homes at $5,000 each yields more labor to artisans than the construction of 100 huge public buildings at $5,000,000 each. The part machinery plays in steel, concrete, and stone construction is well known. In home building the machine is negligible; it still takes carpenters to nail on the siding of a cottage. The benefits from a home-building program will not be concentrated in a few areas but will be scattered among thousands of communities.

I am not as well qualified as I should like to be to discuss the relative merits of the bill before us and the measure as it was before the Committee on Banking and Currency amended it, for I am not a member of the committee and had no opportunity to see the bill in its present form until the House convened today. However, from the study I have been able to give it and the remarks made by its sponsors I have concluded that the committee has quite forgotten the original purpose of the measure, and that the bill as it is presented to us now is one for the relief of certain financial interests instead of for the relief of labor.

And let me call your attention to the fact that thus far in this session we have done very little for labor. I doubt not that we shall bring down upon ourselves the criticism of a considerable section of the people if we permit this measure to be only another law in the interests of finance. Are we not again making the mistake of attempting to restore prosperity by sprinkling the leaves and branches of the tree instead of nourishing its roots with water?

Some of you on the Democratic side of the House have had much to say about the $90,000,000 the Reconstruction Finance Corporation advanced to Mr. Dawes' bank in Chicago. Your taunts have been hurled across the aisle time without number. Are you going to permit us to hurl the challenge back and ask by what reasoning you distinguish between advancing money on the assets of a distressed Chicago bank and placing the Government's guaranty back of questionable mortgages on homes built during the easy money era?

Under the terms of this measure much of the Government's credit will be pledged, not for new construction or for repairs, which would give employment to labor, but to refinance mortgages, on houses built in the past; and you must know that it is not the good mortgages Uncle Sam will get. He will be handed the "cats and dogs" the regular financial institutions no longer care to carry in their portfolios. He will get the slow paper backed by questionable security, not the prime mortgages given by responsible makers. And is it for that purpose you ask us to pass this bill, emasculated of its merits and loaded down with provisions that would damn it to defeat if we did not feel that we had to vote for it to save something around which the Members of the other body can build a better bill?

There is a tragic unemployment situation in the heavy industries today. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, says that of the 1,500,000 men normally engaged in the building trades, only about 300,000 have reasonably steady work. There are 1,200,000 carpenters, stonemasons, bricklayers, plasterers, and other artisans who need the jobs to provide which should be the primary purpose of this legislation. Behind these 1,500,000 stand 3,000,000 others, normally engaged in those industries which produce material out of which houses are built.

The railroads also are suffering at this time, and thousands of railroad men are out of work. In normal times one-fifth of the tonnage of American railroads is building material. The hundreds of millions we make available in this bill to refinance houses that have already been built will not furnish freight for a single box car.

Here is an opportunity to do something for the railroads, for engineers, brakemen, yardmen, and machinists, for the industries engaged in the production of the materials of which houses are built, for carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, and stonemasons, and what do we do? Pass a bill for the relief of mortgage holders. And we take good care of the mortgage holders; we leave them in the enjoyment of high interest rates, when everybody who has given serious thought to the present situation must know that it demands much lower rates. We cannot carry $200,000,000,000 of debt and still have the income necessary to get the economic machine off dead center unless we reduce interest rates enough to reestablish the former relationship between debtor and creditor income.

Mortgages insured by the United States Government will be just as secure as United States bonds. Why should they carry a higher interest rate? If we do not pass a bill that will give the people some relief, then pray, what excuse shall we offer for passing this legislation?

I feel that we should send this bill back to the committee with instructions from the House to carry out the purposes which the President of the United States had in mind when he demanded housing legislation.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Does the gentleman believe that requiring communities to raise $5,000,000 to start these corporations is going along with the administration's original draft of the bill and that it would give work to the unemployed?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I believe that anything that can be done that will insure that the money that is raised, however it is raised and however much or how little is raised, will go into the building of new homes instead of the taking over of loans on homes that have already been constructed will stimulate employment and at least do something to restore prosperity. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, if it please the chairman of the committee, I will yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STOKES], and then yield the remainder of the time back to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I shall not dwell at length on any of the details of the housing bill except one. Section 202, I think, should be amended. It reads as follows:

SEC. 202. The Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out from section 4 subsection (c), thereof, "$2,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,500,000,000."

Now, it will be remembered that we have already authorized the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to issue $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds which are to be exchanged for distressed mortgages. These bonds are guaranteed, principal and interest, by the United States, and, in addition, are exempt from all taxation, except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes. Now, mark that well, Mr. Chairman. These bonds are exempt from all general taxation. The new issue of $1,500,000,000 authorized in this bill will also be exempt from taxation. I do not believe this exemption should be given. It will be recalled that in the recent Senate hearings it was disclosed that some of the wealthiest banking houses of New York had not paid any taxes for several years; and one of the reasons they had paid no taxes was because they had bought tax-exempt bonds which enabled them to avoid it. In this bill, however, we authorize the issuance of $1,500,000,000 of tax-exempt securities. In my opinion, this is all wrong. Mr. Mellon opposed it; Mr. Morgenthau has opposed it. Why should we do it? These bonds are not being sold by the Government to the public; they are being exchanged for distressed mortgages. They are guaranteed both as to principal and interest by the United States. That surely is sufficient.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOKES. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Are the bonds to which the gentleman refers totally tax-exempt, or merely exempt from the normal tax?

Mr. STOKES. They are totally tax-exempt, except the surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Is the gentleman sure about that?

Mr. STOKES. Yes; I am sure about that. Now, these bonds mostly go into the hands of the wealthy trust funds. In Philadelphia, whence I come, an officer of one of the largest banks there told me that they had a very large amount of these bonds owned mostly by wealthy trust estates. This provision in the pending bill means withdrawing from the hands of these wealthy people $1,500,000,000 of taxable mortgages and substituting tax-exempt bonds.

Mr. Gladstone, who was one of the ablest statesmen the world has ever known, in speaking on this very subject on a bill he had introduced in Parliament to prevent British charities from being tax exempt—charities, mind you, churches—said:

Tax exemption by the Government is the same thing as a gift by the Government.

If we permit this huge amount of tax-exempt bonds to be outstanding, we are merely making gifts to these wealthy people and will make it all the harder to balance our Budget. We have nearly $40,000,000,000 worth of these bonds outstanding now; and I, therefore, urge you to support an amendment I shall offer to this section.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN].

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I was one of the first who advocated the construction of new homes and the modernization and repair of existing homes as a measure which would go a long way toward bringing back recovery and which would at the same time provide us with housing facilities which are badly needed.

On the very first day of the session I introduced a bill (H.R. 6141) which provides for the financing of the construction of new homes through the instrumentality of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. On January 8, 1934, I introduced another bill (H.R. 6564) which embodied that program in a revised form.

I then called upon the President and urged upon him a large-scale housing program as a vital and necessary part of the recovery program. The President did not hesitate to express his sympathy with my housing program and his great interest in it and referred my bill to Mr. Fahey, Chairman of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; to Mr. Walker, Executive Director of the National Emergency Council; and to his other advisers.

After renewed consideration of the subject I again revised my plans for a housing program and introduced H.R. 9118, which I sent to the members of the administration who were considering the housing program.

As a result of the studies of the housing situation and of the tremendous unemployment existing among members of the building trades, the administration formulated a program which is incorporated in H.R. 9620, the bill which we are now considering.

I have given this brief summary of my own activities in connection with the proposed bill only for the purpose of showing my deep interest and sympathy with the purposes of this bill.

The building industry has a larger proportion of unemployed than any other industry in the country. General construction has dropped from $11,000,000,000 to about $3,000,000,000. From 1923 to 1926 home building, in 257 cities in the United States, amounted to a yearly average of $2,200,000,000. In 1932 and 1933 it had dropped to a yearly average of approximately $100,000,000, or to about 5 percent of the average of 1923 to 1926.

The building industry employs directly and indirectly in normal times about four and a half million people. It is likely that more than three and a half million of these are now unemployed. Therefore, it must be clear to every person who has studied the question of unemployment that the building trades supply a very large proportion of our huge army of unemployed. A stimulation of the construction industry would return thousands and thousands of these unemployed to their jobs in the building trades.

It is clear that a large scale construction program would considerably reduce the number of unemployed. It is the best way to smother the depression and bring us back to normal times.

Mr. Chairman, the main purpose of the housing bill, therefore, should be to provide the funds for the stimulation of the construction industry by the construction of new homes and by the repair and modernization of existing homes.

I am also in favor of providing relief for the building-and-loan associations.

I now want to address myself to a part of the bill which is of extreme importance, section 105 of the bill as amended. This section appears on page 47 and provides that the Home Credit Insurance Corporation, which is created by this bill, shall have the power to insure amortized mortgages and like liens on owner-occupied homes. As the bill was originally written, it also provided for the insurance of mortgages on low-cost housing projects. Slum eradication and low-cost housing projects are required in order to provide decent homes for the industrial workers in the cities of the United States. It is absolutely necessary that the men who work in the mines and the factories can find decent homes at low cost, homes which rent for about $5 or $6 a room, so that they can rent a 5-room house for $25 or $30 a month. But that provision was stricken out of section 105 by the committee. I cannot understand this action, and it should be remedied. The financing of low-cost housing projects should be restored to section 105 of the bill.

This Congress has done a great deal for the benefit of the banks, the insurance companies, the railroads, and large financial interests. It has done very little for the benefit of the workers. Low-cost housing is necessary for the welfare of the industrial worker in the large cities. It is necessary to provide decent housing for the workers.

An amendment will be offered to insert a provision for low-cost housing projects in section 105, so as to restore the original text of this section. I hope the House will adopt it.

I also want to call the attention of the committee to section 202 of the bill, as amended.

I want to congratulate the committee on inserting that section. It was not in the original bill, but it is one of the most useful sections that has been added by the committee. If the committee had done no more than add this section to the bill, it should receive the applause of the entire House. This section gives to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation the power to issue an additional one and one-half billion dollars of bonds, so that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will be enabled to issue a total of $3,700,000,000 of bonds. The Corporation is given the power to use $500,000,000 for investment in building-and-loan associations.

I hold in my hand a statement issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation dated June 5. In this statement we find that on June 5 applications amounting to four and one-half billion dollars have already been filed with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Under the act as it stands today the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has power to issue bonds amounting to only $2,200,000,000, whereas the applications already on file total four and one-half billion dollars.

It is clear that the added section is vital and necessary for the benefit of thousands upon thousands of distressed home owners who are in imminent danger of losing their homes.

I am happy to see that the committee has added section 202, and I hope it will remain in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4½ minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, in the debate on this bill I wish to call attention to the fact that if this is the last major bill which we are to act on in this session the RECORD will show that we have opened and closed the first and second sessions of the Seventy-third Congress with legislation for the bankers rather than for the people. I propose to vote for this bill, nevertheless, because of the advantages it will afford over the present building-and-loan and mortgage set-ups. From that standpoint I consider it a constructive, forward-looking measure.

Public, No. 1, enacted in this Congress, authorized the issuance of $2,000,000,000 in fiat money, which was turned over to the closed banks in order to permit them to reopen. This bill we are now discussing, and which proposes to guarantee the private loans of banks and mortgage companies, is another subsidy to the banking and financial fraternity at the expense of our taxpayers. By analogy it would appear that we have as much right to guarantee the private debts of the citizen who is indebted to the butcher, the baker, and other citizens. I cannot understand why the money power should be singled out and given preferential rights over the private citizen in the conduct of his private business. Equality under the Constitution should be our objective as legislators and not special preferential consideration to any individual group, and especially not to the money crowd, which continues to exact its pound of flesh through inordinate interest rates.

In this bill we not only guarantee the private loans of the money lender but we again withdraw from taxation billions in wealth by exempting these obligations from taxes, both as to principal and interest. It is self-evident that the more wealth we exempt from taxation, the more do we add to the tax burden of the citizen.

Our action in the bank guaranty bill is, in a sense, somewhat synonymous with the action we are taking in this bill. Under the bank guaranty bill we have taken from the taxpayers of America approximately $300,000,000 of their own money for the purpose of guaranteeing their own money which they have on deposit in private banks. In addition to this, under the bank guaranty bill we are turning over to the private bankers $1,200,000,000 of the taxpayers' deposits in the postal savings at an interest rate of only 2½ percent. This huge amount of the taxpayers' postal savings is turned over to the private banking fraternity at this low rate of interest without one cent of guaranty. This huge amount of money is immediately used by the private bankers to purchase Government bonds carrying as high as 4 or more percent interest or the money is reloaned to the citizen at an interest rate of 7 percent or more. We are thus giving to the private bankers the use of the taxpayers' postal savings deposits and at the same time permitting the bankers to absorb profits for themselves of almost $50,000,000 annually. How long the taxpayers can continue to pay subsidies, such as I have enumerated above, to the private banking ring is problematical.

Title II of this bill, which seeks to extend loans to the citizen to rehabilitate his home through repairs, remodeling, painting, and so forth, is an evidence of the Administration's sympathetic interest in the distressed citizen. It is my belief that I was the first Representative in Congress to suggest this plan to the President. On page 23 of the record of the proceedings of the general meeting and executive meeting of the Federal Civil Works Administration, held in Washington on November 15, 1933, will be found my suggestion to the Civil Works Administration and the President that loans for this purpose be extended to the citizens as soon as possible, in order to give honorable employment at a good wage to our unemployed and, indirectly, to stimulate the heavy industries in the furnishing of supplies such as lumber, steel, roofing, masonry, and so forth. At the time this suggestion was made to the Chairman of the Civil Works Administration the record discloses that it was not favorably considered, but later a reply received from the President, under date of December 2, 1933, indicated that the administration was becoming receptive to my suggestion.

During this session of the Congress I again took up this question with the President in the interest of reducing our expenditures for Federal relief and stimulating the entire building program in our country. I consider this bill, therefore, with a spirit of elation, not because of my own efforts but because of the fact that the administration's acceptance of such a program of extending loans for the rehabilitation of homes and the construction of new buildings will open up the channels of employment for millions of our honorable distressed citizens who have borne the dark days from which we are now emerging with such admirable fortitude and confidence in the administration.

This bill we are discussing has considerable merit and is, in my opinion, the most progressive plan yet advanced in the interest of the taxpayer and our unemployed. My only criticism is that we are giving a subsidy to the private money lender by guaranteeing him against loss on loans which are extended under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. Does the gentleman not think that by guaranteeing some of these mortgages in these improved banks that the banks will in those instances retain and keep the mortgages and not call them, so that it will indirectly help some home owners whose mortgages are now held by banks?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I am not in favor of banks holding mortgages at all. I am in favor of abolishing the Federal Reserve System and placing the Government in the banking business.

Inasmuch as the administration has authority, under the Gold Devaluation Act, to coin $8,000,000,000 of new money, which amount, under existing law, is adequately and properly protected on a ratio of paper money in circulation to the gold reserve, it was my hope that the Administration would coin at least several billions and that through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, credit might be extended on a basis of these funds to the citizen at the lowest possible rate of interest. In no event should the citizen be charged more than 2½-percent interest which is the same rate of interest the private bankers pay today to the Government on postal-savings funds which are turned over to them daily by the Post Office Department.

In the interest of the taxpayer, I have protested and will continue to protest the issuance of tax-exempt securities, every dollar of which, when removed from taxation both as to principal and interest, adds to the burden of our already overburdened and distressed property owners and citizens. Every dollar which we spend in the issuance of tax-exempt securities must be repaid twofold by the citizen over a period of approximately 17 years.

It should be further considered that when the Government issues tax-exempt securities it is merely extending Government credit to the Federal Reserve System without interest, and the Federal Reserve System in turn receives from the Government a promise to repay the entire amount of the bond, plus interest, both of which, to the disadvantage of the taxpayer, are tax exempt for the bondholder.

The progress we have made thus far in our Democratic administration may be compared with that of the rich man in the Bible who accosted Christ in his desire to be saved. He gave tithes, fasted, and was otherwise an exemplary citizen, but when told to give all he had to the poor and follow the Master, he declined. All the good accomplished thus far by our present Democratic administration will not be of permanent avail until we, as a people, free ourselves from the domination of the wealth of Wall Street and the international bankers—that is, until we, so to speak, divorce ourselves from wealth as was suggested to the rich man. Instead of subserviency to the money crowd, we should follow the principles of the Constitution and exercise our prerogative thereunder to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and extend credit to the citizen without the intermediary private financier who will continue, if undisturbed, as he has in the past, to clip coupons and shave off interest to the detriment of our people economically and socially.

I am very sorry that we are adjourning the Congress without having provided adequate employment at decent wages for our millions of unemployed. Furthermore, we have failed to enact one single act for the benefit of our railroad workers, or other organized labor groups, except though the N.R.A. We have likewise failed to provide proper relief through the establishment of old-age pensions for those who because of advanced age and because they are no longer wanted in employment are unable to provide for themselves. Under the nationalization of banking, the billions of profits which today accrue to the private money lender should be absorbed by the National Government for the purpose of reducing taxes, for the payment of old-age pensions, and for the employment of our unemployed on public improvements, at a living wage.

We should not overlook the fact that the granting of old-age pensions would broaden the field and give a better opportunity to youth to secure employment. I am not speaking of unattainable Utopian conditions; I am speaking of a clearly demonstrable and practical procedure which, if adopted, would give to the Government the huge profits of the private banking ring and thus permit the Government not only to reduce taxation, but at the same time to initiate the humane policy of caring for our aged individuals, thus broadening the field of opportunity for the millions of our American youth who through the machinations of the octopus of the private international and Wall Street banking ring are being choked out of their God-given rights.

As a Democrat in the Congress from the Twelfth District of California, I believe in immediate action, for I do not wish that our people should continue to suffer through indefinite delay of these humane innovations. In the old deal under Moses the Isralites waited 40 years to enter the promised land. In the new deal we can and should attain this objective by the enactment of the nationalization of banking before the adjournment of Congress.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE I—NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SECTION 101. This title may be cited as the "National Housing Act."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time simply for the purpose of stating the views of President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, on this bill. I should like to make the position of labor clear on it, so that if the bill is not amended by the House, as I believe it should be, when it goes to conference the Senate will insist on their original bill, and the bill will then be satisfactory to labor.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON] in his remarks a few moments ago expressed pretty fully the sentiments of labor on this bill. I should like to read Mr.

Green's statement for release in the Monday morning papers of June 11, which is as follows:

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, yesterday denounced the action of the House Committee on Banking and Currency in reporting "a totally inadequate housing bill that complies neither with the needs of the country nor the wishes of President Roosevelt to provide a competent housing bill and provide employment for the 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 persons directly and indirectly dependent upon the building trades for employment", and called on Congress to adopt the program sponsored by the President.

"The administration's program is not only a housing program, it is a labor program as well, and it is high time this Congress did something for labor", he declared. "Thus far, it has not passed a single labor measure. This might with profit be borne in mind by those Senators and all the Representatives seeking reelection this fall and who will seek labor votes with professions of friendship for labor to do something practical and tangible to back up such claims."

"Labor", said Mr. Green in his statement, "is vitally interested in the passage of the administration's housing bill as presented. It has applauded the President in his efforts to secure an adequate housing bill and at the same time do something for the long-suffering building-trades men and those not actually engaged in building who depend upon building for their livelihoods.

"Labor is further interested because most of the workers have to pay rent. The excessive cost of mortgage money, which the administration's bill should end, is paid by those who toil—the landlord does not absorb it. The excessive costs are further a burden upon those of our people who own homes and serves to prevent others of them from acquiring homes.

"As presented to the Congress, the housing bill promised great relief to the unemployed in the building and allied industries by breaking the blockade on mortgage money that has prevailed since 1928, when, so far as the building trades are concerned, the depression began. The bill would release the immense volumes of money now held by banks and by other lending institutions and individuals.

"The bill as reported to the House dams a large part of this money up in the banks instead of releasing it. The vaults of many of our financial institutions are bulging with money and credits that could be used to make mortgage loans. Under the administration bill these loans would be insured and paid off in easy installments over a period of 20 years, and they would bear a low rate of interest.

"The bill reported in the House also omits the very wise provision permitting the setting up of national loan associations through which many millions of private money could be released for insured loans, bearing the Government guarantee of safety for principal and interest under conditions that would do what the old type of loan has not done, protect both the borrower and the lender, both of whom have suffered such immense losses in the years just past.

"It is quite true that the House bill provides $500,000,000 of Government funds for building-and-loan associations. Such associations are all right within their sphere. They have done and they will continue to serve a useful purpose, but $500,000,000 cannot begin to give the relief that the tapping of the immense sums in the hands of the banks and other institutions under the provisions of the bill as presented to Congress would release.

"The action of the House committee tends to make what should be a simple legislative matter to be disposed of easily, a controversial matter, certain to cause delay and, and in those the closing hours of the session, possibly endanger the passing of the law.

"This is a matter of vital importance to labor. There are, approximately 1,500,000 building-trades men in the United States. Of this number 80 percent, or 1,200,000, are idle and forced to support themselves and their dependents as best they can. Of the other 300,000 comparatively few have steady work. There is much broken time.

"Behind the building craftsman actually on the job there are in normal times 3,000,000 men engaged in the preparation and manufacture of building materials. When the building-trades man is not at work these others are not at work. These two elements today make up the largest group in the millions who are still idle and want to work.

"The railroad workers are also suffering. In normal times one out of every five freight cars is loaded with building materials. The prompt passage of an adequate housing bill, which the President no later than yesterday expressed the wish Congress would enact, would be immensely helpful to the railroad workers, and also to the truckmen. In fact, the ramifications of the President's housing program, the possibilities of benefits to every class and to every section, are almost infinite. They simply cannot be enumerated.

"It is a paradoxical situation—an unprecedented need for repairs on nearly one-half of the homes of the country, a growing demand for new homes on the part of men and women entitled on the basis of character and resources to credit with which to build them, the banks bulging with money that might be used for these purposes, and hundreds of thousands idle because the money that would provide work cannot be promptly released as the President wants it released.

"We are with the President in this matter. We will work for the housing bill as he wants it. We hope that the Congress will promptly pass the bill. We don't want 'relief.' We want the work that an adequate housing bill would make possible."

I agree fully with the sentiments expressed by Mr. Green in his statement, and may I add further that I believe President Roosevelt should be supported by the membership of this House in his desire to see the prompt enactment of this legislation, not as reported by the Banking and Currency Committee to the House but as reported by the subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. The bill reported by the Senate subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee is the form of legislation desired by the President and by labor.

The Fletcher-Steagall housing bill is, in the eyes of labor, something more than a measure to provide for the modernization of existing homes and the building of new ones by breaking the blockade of the mortgage-money market that began to develop early in 1928.

It is, in the opinion of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and of Michael J. McDonough, president of its building-trades department, the greatest employment measure on President Roosevelt's recovery program, affording as it does hope of employment to not less than 4,500,000 men.

It offers—

According to Mr. Green—the opportunity to break down the one great block in the army of unemployed, now estimated at 9,500,000, and presents an opportunity to Senators and Representatives seeking reelection in November to demonstrate in a very practical, tangible way their friendship for labor.

It provides—

According to Mr. McDonough—

the promise of work to not less than 1,200,000 skilled building-trades men now idle, and steady work to 300,000 now in large part only partially employed, and to a comparably large number of the 3,000,000 in the building materials trades who in normal times provide the lumber, the mortar, the steel, the brick, and the many other things that go into the construction of the modern home and in the modernization of existing homes.

Moreover—

According to Messrs. Green and McDonough—

the benefits offered by the bill will be shared by every section, every city, town, and hamlet in the United States.

In a telegram to all of the international building-trades unions affiliated with the building-trades department, calling upon them to direct their local unions to wire their Senators and Representatives to vote for the measure, Mr. McDonough pointed out the imperative necessity that the bill be passed promptly and as presented to both Houses.

Selfish financial interests which cannot or will not provide the necessary mortgage money to start renovating of old and construction of new building are seeking to emasculate the bill or defeat it by delay in the closing hours of Congress—

He wired, adding that—haste in securing action is imperative.

The estimates of Messrs. Green and McDonough of the possibilities of the bill as an employment measure are borne out by surveys made by the National Emergency Council, of which Frank C. Walker is executive secretary, by the Department of Commerce, the National Recovery Administration, and other public and private agencies.

These surveys show that, among other things, building reached its peak a full year before the Wall Street crash of 1929, the depression, so far as the building industry was concerned, beginning in 1928 with a tightening of the mortgage-money market that soon became the blockade it now is; that there is a shortage today of not less than 800,000 homes, with the demand greatest for small houses, the building of which the bill is designed to promote; that not less than 40 percent of the dwellings now standing are in need of repairs, one-half of which are of a major nature; and a real, but as yet spotty, and not overimpressive demand for new homes that cannot be financed under the existing conditions in the mortgage-money markets.

The actual shortage of homes, these surveys show, is due to the almost total recession of building in the last 5 years, as shown by a decline from a normal annual expenditure of $3,000,000,000 to a scant $300,000,000, and to the deterioration of old buildings to the point where they are hardly habitable, plus the destruction of buildings by fire, the tearing down of unprofitable ones to avoid taxes, and the almost total cessation of repair work in the 5-year period beginning in 1929.

This cessation of repairs and modernization has in this period, the surveys show, built up an enormous backlog of work that with normal accretions will require years to eliminate even with the assistance home owners will secure under the provisions of the bill. The types of work to be done range from such minor repairs as papering rooms or whitewashing ceilings, to the replacement of foundations and roofs, and include the substitution of modern heating apparatus for the obsolete and expensive furnaces of a generation ago, the installation of modern lighting equipment and modern bathing facilities.

An idea of the extent of the modernization work waiting to be done may be had from the fact that no less than 5,000,000 homes in the United States today lack the commonest types of baths, and a much larger number are not wired for electricity.

As the labor men visualize the operations of the act, the immediate effect of the provision for secured loans to home owners not in distress, who are not unemployed and whose characters make them good credit risks, will be the resumption of repair work and modernization on a gradually ascending scale, this to be followed by a growing volume of new building.

The one-family home which is the type for which the greater potential demand exists provides comparatively more work than the multiple type of dwelling. In some trades, as in plumbing, ten 1-family houses require vastly more labor and material than is required in a 10-unit building.

Gross figures of unemployment in the building industry do not present the picture as sharply as do the records of the Civil Works Administration. Thus the records show that in one mid-western city out of 40,000 building-trades men, but 5,000 were employed in March, with between 50 and 60 percent of these on C.W.A. work.

Of the 3,780 bricklayers registered by the C.W.A. in that city, 1,260 were employed as laborers and only 175 as bricklayers; out of 5,288 carpenters, 1,300 worked as laborers and only 356 at their trade, while out of 5,012 painters registered, 2,103 worked with pot and brush, 2,500 worked as laborers, and 409 had no work at all.

The importance, from the standpoint of employment, of the building-supply trades is shown by the 1929 census of manufactures and mines, which lists 25 industries entirely dependent on building, which even in the early days of the depression employed more than 700,000 men.

These are:

Cast-iron pipe	20,900
Cement	38,700
Clay products	101,600
Concrete products	20,000
Copper, tin, and sheet-iron work	35,600
Gas machines, gas meters, and liquid meters	7,400
Lime	9,500
Marble, granite—cutting and finishing	43,700
Metal doors, shutters, window sash and frames	11,900
Paving materials: Asphalt, tar, crushed slag, etc	2,900
Planing-mill products	107,100
Plumbers' supplies	31,300
Pumps and pumping equipment	30,000
Roofing, built-up and roll, asphalt shingles, etc	7,500
Sand and gravel	19,600
Sand, lime, brick	700
Steam fittings, hot-water heating apparatus	46,000
Stone products—quarrying	51,900
Structural and ornamental iron and steel work	68,600
Wall paper	5,400
Wall plaster, wall board, etc	9,000
Windmills and windmill towers	1,800
Window and door screens and weather strip	4,900
Wood preserving	14,500
Wrought pipe, welded and heavy riveted	12,800
Total number employed	703,300

Other trades, largely but not wholly dependent on building, include such industries as chemicals, electrical apparatus, and in considerable degree agricultural products not usually rated as building materials.

Pretty nearly everybody will get a bit of the building-trade dollar the housing bill will provide—

Asserts Mr. McDonough—

The flax farmer of the Dakotas provides our linseed oil, the sugar planter of Louisiana basic material for wall board, the cotton raiser fiber for a multiplicity of uses and so on almost indefinitely. The contributions of many are not large, but in the aggregate they are considerable.

That is one reason why when the building trades are busy, all trades are busy.

In other words, the American Federation of Labor makes it plain that they are for the Senate bill as against the House bill, but I want to make clear what the position of labor is in this matter and I hope that as in the past, unless the House passes amendments which will put this bill in the shape desired by the President and labor, the conferees on the part of the other body, the Senate, will insist on the Senate bill which contains the legislation desired by both the President and labor.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. May I ask the gentleman how much more reemployment would be made possible under the original bill?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Green explains it very plainly here where he states that the money you provide under your bill does not come anywhere near meeting the need.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is a general statement. If the gentleman will permit another question, he refers to the Senate bill. What bill of the Senate does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. CONNERY. I refer to the Fletcher-Steagall bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. There is no Senate bill yet. The bill is still in the subcommittee of the Senate committee, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. CONNERY. I refer to the Senate bill which is before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, the Fletcher bill.

Mr. SWEENEY. The old title II of the Senate bill which is stricken out in this bill?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the gentleman know whether or not title II will be in the Senate bill?

Mr. CONNERY. We feel fairly positive it will be in that bill from what we have heard through the newspapers and in conversation with Senators.

Mr. STEAGALL. What provision is there in title II that affords reemployment?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Green has explained that in his letter.

Mr. SWEENEY. That is the provision providing for new construction.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; if the gentleman will first permit me to read particularly this part of the statement of Mr. Green for the information of my good friend [Mr. STEAGALL], the chairman of the committee:

As presented to the Congress, the housing bill promised great relief to the unemployed in the building and allied industries by breaking the blockade on mortgage money that has prevailed since 1928, when, so far as the building trades are concerned, the depression began. The bill would release the immense volumes of money now held by banks and by other lending institutions and individuals.

The bill as reported to the House dams a large part of this money up in the banks instead of releasing it. The vaults of many of our financial institutions are bulging with money and credits that could be used to make mortgage loans. Under the administration bill these loans would be insured and paid off in easy installments over a period of 20 years, and they would bear a low rate of interest.

The bill reported in the House also omits the very wise provision permitting the setting-up of national loan associations through which many millions of private money could be released for insured loans, bearing the Government guarantee of safety for principal and interest under conditions that would do what the old type of loan has not done—protect both the borrower and the lender, both of whom have suffered such immense losses in the years just past.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Why should we wait until a bill comes from the Senate and goes to conference in order to get the original title II put back in the bill here? Why not offer the amendment from the floor of the House and do the job as we go along?

Mr. CONNERY. I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, and I believe that is exactly what we should do and thus get speedy action on the bill and get it to the White House for the President's signature. With the bill complying with the Senate provisions, there would then be no need for a conference, or only a conference for slight changes.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. Am I to understand from the gentleman that Mr. Green and the American Federation of Labor endorse this bill?

Mr. CONNERY. No; they are in favor of the bill that the President asked to be enacted, which is not the House bill but the Fletcher bill, now before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. I hope that the House will see fit to amend this bill to comply with the provisions of the Fletcher bill, and then we will have the housing legislation asked for by the President and endorsed by labor.

[Here the gavel fell.]

TITLE II OF ORIGINAL BILL SHOULD BE PUT BACK

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The four component parts of the housing program are as follows: First, modernization; second, mortgage insurance; third, mortgage associations; fourth, insurance of building-and-loan associations.

The administration has asked for the passage of a bill embodying these four component parts. The Banking and Currency Committee has omitted a part of them. I hope the House restores the omitted provisions.

In this vast and important program let us cooperate with the administration 100 percent.

Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I am in accord with the views of a majority of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee, but I am not in favor of striking out the original bill title II. The committee has inserted another title II which is not satisfactory to me. I think this is one of the most material and necessary provisions of the entire bill. At the proper time the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON] will offer an amendment to restore it, and I hope his amendment will be adopted. An amendment should also be adopted putting back into the bill provisions for low-cost housing.

I am not in love with the Federal Reserve Banking System of this country. These 12 banks have become bond brokers dealing in Government bonds, paying themselves high salaries, and doing the country little, if any, good. I think they should be taken over by the Government, but at the same time, as long as we have a Federal Reserve Banking System for the banks, what reason can you assign for not having this a somewhat similar set-up, although not supported by the Government, for the home owners of this country?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is exactly what we undertook to do when we set up the home-loan bank system, which was a rediscount system for home-mortgage loans.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I supported the bill. But since additional facilities are needed, we must set up a different system. It is not exactly like the Federal Reserve at all, but it will afford additional credit facilities and aid the unemployed and the distressed home owners. It is really a system that will provide for mortgage associations.

Mr. STEAGALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it has not failed.

Mr. PATMAN. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation has today 1,350,000 applications for loans, aggregating four and a half billion dollars, that are not granted. The Chairman of the Home Loan Corporation testified to that before the gentleman's committee.

WHO OPPOSES TITLE II?

Now, who is opposing this title II? It is true that some of the building-and-loan companies are opposing it because they feel it will be in slight competition with them. They do not want to lose any opportunity to get all the business. They will have an opportunity to get plenty of business if title II is made effective.

Some real-estate men oppose it, because they feel that old houses will not be readily sold if new houses are built. The savings banks represent the main opposition to these provisions, is my guess. Savings banks are paying 3 percent. They want the opportunity to invest the money of the depositors at 6, 8, and 10 percent. There is the main opposition—the large savings banks that have large savings accounts.

1 PERCENT OF DEPOSITORS OWN 60 PERCENT OF DEPOSITS

Now, remember that 60 percent of the deposits in banks are owned by 1 percent of the depositors. Do not misunderstand me—60 percent of the deposits of the banks are owned by 1 percent of the depositors of those banks. They do not want anything done in the shape of competition by the Government. They want a wide-open field. Yet they will not extend the loans that are needed.

20,000 FORECLOSURES A MONTH

There are 20,000 foreclosures per month on homes going on right now; there were 25,000 foreclosures a month before the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was organized. This title 2 is to relieve the unemployment situation and the distressed home owners. We should not be thinking about the static thrown in here by a few banks and the building-and-loan associations. That is the object of this legislation. If we are to carry out the full intent of the President's message we should put title II back in the bill.

Many of the banks are not functioning. They are subsidized by the Government. Why give them an additional premium for ceasing to do business as provided in one section of the bill?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BLANKET MORTGAGE ON PEOPLE'S PROPERTY

Mr. PATMAN. In one provision of this bill it provides for a home owner who desires to borrow money, say, a thousand dollars, to repair his home, to give a thousand-dollar note to a national bank and get the money. The national bank will accept it under this bill. Of course, he will agree to pay 6-, 8-, or 10-percent interest. The national bank or member bank of the Federal Reserve System will take it to the nearest Federal Reserve bank and get Federal Reserve notes for it—new currency, 100 percent. The result is that the Federal bank gets the money out of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and pays 27 cents for it, and then lets the national bank have it by collecting 1½-, 2-, or 2½-percent interest—whatever the rediscount rate is. It pays nothing on earth to the Government for the privilege of issuing a blanket mortgage against all property and all incomes of all the people.

Then the national bank lets the man who borrowed the thousand dollars have the money. The credit of the Nation has been extended to the home owner through these two particular set-ups. The credit of the Nation will not cost the Federal Reserve banks anything. It will cost the local bank a very small amount.

AL CAPONE GANG

The Federal Reserve banks are owned by private corporations. Not a penny of their stock is owned by the Government or any individual. They have a monopoly on the issuance of the Government's credit. This power will be taken away from them one of these days and the great privilege used in the interest of the people. The people are getting wise to this great legalized racket. Every Federal Reserve bank has a racket that is worth by many hundred or thousand times the racket exercised by Al Capone and his entire gang in their most active days. It is not the same Federal Reserve System established under President Wilson. It has been completely changed by the adoption of so-called "perfecting" amendments.

1933 REPORT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

I have in my hand a recent report of the Federal Reserve Board, released yesterday, and from it I shall give you information that is absolutely shocking. In 1928 the Federal Reserve banks of this Nation discounted bills amounting to $62,000,000,000. They were helping the country by extending credit. In 1929 they discounted bills aggregating $60,000,000,000. In 1930 the discounts were down to $14,000,000,000. In 1931 the discounts were $14,000,000,000. In 1932 they discounted $18,000,000,000 in bills, and last year, 1933—and this is the last report—they discounted only $9,000,000,000—50 percent of what they discounted the year before. The Federal Reserve banks of this country are ceasing to function; they are absolutely in the way; they are a hindrance and a harm. They are failing to use the credit of this Nation in the interest of the welfare of our country but use it for their own special benefit and private profit. The Federal Reserve Board reports will prove what I am saying.

Now, take the actual currency handled by these banks last year. It was more than the year before. On small coins, 5-, 10-, 25-, and 50-cent pieces, the amount was just twice as much as it was the year before, but on discounted bills it was just half as much, which indicates that the people might be reduced to small purchases and handle small amounts of money and are receiving very limited credit. They cannot handle any large amounts because the medium of exchange is insufficient and these reports disclose it. The banks are not functioning and all the building-and-loan companies are not functioning, yet they come in here and want you to further protect their interests by taking title II out of this bill. If you want a real bill that will relieve unemployment, clear the slums, construct new houses, and put millions of people back to work, put title II back in this bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Is it not a fact that the home-loan bank system with a capital of only $125,000,000 has more bills discounted, carrying more loans in their portfolio, than the entire Federal Reserve System?

Mr. PATMAN. That is my understanding, and they have been operating only about a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, some of us are anxious to get through with this bill tonight. We are anxious to facilitate the adjournment of this Congress. The gentleman from Texas has talked for 10 minutes and is not addressing himself to the section under consideration. I shall deem it a kindness to the House if I insist that remarks be addressed to the section under consideration. Therefore, I object.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-nine Members present, a quorum.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The reason that I have favored this housing bill is because I believe that if there is anything that this Government owes to its citizens in return for their support of this social order it is a decent home. When the President first gave his message to Congress——

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not addressing himself to the section under consideration.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I am addressing myself to the part referring to "a national housing act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. O'MALLEY. When the President first gave his message to Congress, he said he intended that we should do something for the people who are without decent, livable homes, and the very heart of the program, as I recall the message, was the establishment of these Federal building-and-loan associations, so that the people could get enough money at low interest to build or repair homes. I have had at least a half dozen building-and-loan-association officials in the last week come down here to Washington, or send telegrams, opposing this part of the bill, and I have tried to find out from them if their associations are lending money to people so that they can build or repair their homes. Some time ago we tried to establish in my State one of the Federal savings-and-loan associations as provided for in the law creating the home-loan bank that we passed. We got some citizens together who were willing to subscribe some money for stock to organize one of these Federal savings associations. We found, after proposing our plan, that we had almost the united opposition of the established building-and-loan associations.

They wrote to the Home Loan Bank Board and said that we did not need an association like this, that they could loan all of the money necessary to build homes in the city of Milwaukee. They have not made any loans because scores of citizens of our community who have asked them to make loans, loans for the purpose of repairing property or building homes have been refused. The only way we will get the dammed-up money released is to give these banks who refuse to lend their huge stores of money some competition in helping people obtain funds for rebuilding America. This title II is the very heart of the bill. That is why they want it stricken out. This is the part that gives to the bankers the competition in their own field needed to stimulate trade and commerce. I hope this committee and the Members of the House will put back into this bill the part I know the President wants, because it was the heart of his message to the Congress last week. He outlined this title II so closely in his message to this Congress that the original bill reiterates it almost word for word. I hope the House will put title II back in the bill and send it to the Senate in the bill, and not send this measure to conference without it where the President's housing program may be defeated in a poker game of legislation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the so-called "associations" that are to be chartered until title II insist on adequate collateral under the supervision of the Federal Home Loan Board, will we be any better off under those associations than we will be under the present building-and-loan administration in the various communities? If, however, they liberalize their plan and take on collateral, credit on which the margin is too slim, will it not be hoodwinking the American people and selling a species of security that is unsound?

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman knows he cannot go in with his right eye to a bank or loan association, with collateral as good as any collateral, and get a dime for new construction purposes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I deny that building-and-loan associations are not functioning today. Through the Middle West they are functioning just as they always were, and if there is a semblance of adequate collateral you can get a loan right now.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If the gentleman will try to get a loan, he will find out how much money he can get.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] has expired.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, being somewhat familiar with building-and-loan-association work in Baltimore city, I am certainly glad that title II of this bill has been stricken out. I do not know what the practice is in other cities so far as building-and-loan associations are concerned, but I know the practices in Baltimore city, a city where there are more individual home owners than in any other city in the Union.

The only way the workingman has been able to buy his home has been through the building-and-loan-association system. We have about 1,000 of them. During all this depression there have been no more than four or five associations that have failed, and that was because of some dishonest lawyer or secretary.

Now, we have a system of neighborhood banks, as I call them. It permits the workingman to put away a quarter a week for the benefit of his children. He obtains a share or two shares for each of his children. All he has to do is put away a quarter a week. No man will send to a bank a quarter or a half a dollar a week, but under this system he sends his little boy or little girl around the corner to the building-and-loan association and deposits 25 or 50 cents or a dollar. When he obtains a loan he has from 8 to 10 years to pay. In many instances they run from 12 to 15 years. Why are they successful? They are successful because the directors of the associations receive very little pay. The president gets $50 a year and the directors approximately $30 a year. I represent four of them, and they run from $150,000 to $200,000 in deposits. The president of the association receives $40 or $50 a year. The directors are limited to $30 a year, with the understanding that they must attend seven meetings in each quarter. So you can readily see how the "little fellow" is able to buy his home and save money, with no danger at all to his deposits.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The gentleman said "outside of the attorney." How much does the attorney get?

Mr. PALMISANO. Absolutely nothing. It costs more to get a Home Owners' Loan Corporation loan today in Baltimore city than it does to get a loan from the building association. There is a minimum title fee in Baltimore city of $25. The applicant pays $3 for a committee to investigate the loan. If the loan goes through he pays another dollar or a $1.50 to the president. The whole expense is $30 or $35 in Baltimore today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO] has expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMISANO. In Baltimore today every person who makes application to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and I am not criticizing the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, it is understood that the expense of putting through a deal is from $45 to $50. They have several appraisers. They are entitled to $7.50 a day. You can readily see what it would mean to the thousand building associations in Baltimore city, and to the "little man" who is endeavoring to buy a home.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman said he was glad the committee had stricken out title II of the original bill and substituted title II of the new bill. Title II of the original bill provided for the creation of national mortgage associations. Title II of the committee amendment provides for loans of $500,000,000 from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to building-and-loan associations. Would the gentleman have any objection if we left in title II, providing for loans to building-and-loan associations, and then inserted the original title II also, which does not interfere with the building-and-loan associations at all?

Mr. PALMISANO. I have not studied the bill thoroughly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, we would preserve the building-and-loan associations if we put back the national mortgage association in the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. I am afraid that when you put the Government in competition with these building-and-loan associations, who are working in the interest of the little fellow, you will eventually put them out of business.

An association of this kind is needed to which the man who wants to borrow $300, $400, or $500 can go. Under the building-association system if he goes back to the same lawyer or to the same association, the cost of searching the title the second time is only $5 or $10, for the same man makes the search; but if this big corporation is created it will be found that every time a title is searched a fee larger than this will be charged, for every man who searches a title will want to be paid his own fee because he himself is responsible. In the building association the lawyer who made the search in the first instance deals with the man in the second instance and money is saved by reduced attorney fees.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. What interest do the people in Baltimore pay on loans from the building-and-loan associations?

Mr. PALMISANO. Under the system in force in Baltimore they pay 12 cents a week on a $100 share.

Mr. PATMAN. I am asking about the annual rate of interest.

Mr. PALMISANO. They pay it weekly. They pay 25 cents a share on the principal and 12 cents on the interest. This amounts to $13 on the principal and $6.24 on the interest, but the mortgagor has the right to pay off the $100 whenever he sees fit.

Mr. PATMAN. If the gentleman will yield further, I asked about the annual interest rate. What annual interest rate do the borrowers have to pay?

Mr. PALMISANO. It amounts to $6.24 on $100.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield right there, the gentleman knows that in a building-and-loan association where the loan is amortized monthly 1 percent on the principal and 1 percent on the interest, that the interest runs annually from 12 to 14 percent.

Mr. PALMISANO. I know nothing of the practices of associations outside of Baltimore city.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman is counsel for four building-and-loan associations the gentleman ought to know something about it.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know anything about associations in cities other than Baltimore. As far as Baltimore is concerned, I think it is a godsend to the poor man; and we should not disturb any of them.

[Here the gavel fell.]

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 102. There is hereby created a body corporate to be known as the "Home Credit Insurance Corporation", which shall be an instrumentality of the United States, and which shall have power to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal; to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, bylaws, rules, and regulations governing the way in which its general business may be conducted and the powers granted to it be exercised and enjoyed; and generally to do all things, not inconsistent with the terms of this title, as are customary and usual for corporations to do generally.

The principal office of the Corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in other cities or localities in the United States.

The Corporation shall have a capital stock of not to exceed $200,000,000 subscribed for by the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States. Payments on such subscriptions shall be subject to call in whole or in part at any time by the board of directors. Receipts for payment for or on account of such stock shall be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States and shall be evidence of the stock ownership of the United States. In order to enable the Treasury to make such payments when called, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed, upon written request of the President, to allocate and make available to the Secretary of the Treasury the sum of $200,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, however, That in lieu of calling upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for such funds, the President, in his discretion, is authorized to provide the same or any portion thereof by allotment to the Treasury from such funds as may be available or as may hereafter be made available to him for emergency purposes.

The management of the Corporation shall be vested in a board of directors consisting of not less than five nor more than seven persons to be selected by the President from among the officers and directors of any existing board, commission, corporation, independent establishment, or executive department of the United States. Nothing in any other law shall be construed to prevent any such officer or director so selected from serving as a director of the Corporation. Directors shall serve without additional compensation and shall hold office for a term of 1 year and until their successors are appointed. Whenever a vacancy shall occur among the directors, the person appointed to fill such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired portion of the term of the director whose place he is selected to fill.

The board of directors shall, without regard to the provisions of any other law, appoint such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of the business of the Corporation, fix their compensation, define their duties, require bonds of such of them as the board of directors may designate, and provide a system of organization to fix responsibility and promote efficiency. No such officer, employee, attorney, or agent shall be paid compensation at a rate in excess of the rate provided by law in the case of the members of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. The Corporation, with the consent of any board, corporation, commission, establishment, executive department, or instrumentality of the Government, including any field service thereof, may avail itself of the use of information, services, and facilities thereof in carrying out the provisions of this title, and any such information, services, or facilities are hereby authorized to be so made available. The Corporation shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails in the same manner as executive departments of the Government, and shall determine its necessary expenditures under this act and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, without regard to the provisions of any other law governing the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PATMAN: Page 42, beginning with line 16, strike out section 102.

TITLE II

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, if you strike title II from the original act, the principal difference is that the amendment offered by the Banking and Currency Committee will allow an appropriation of something like $500,000,000, I believe it is, to be expended through building-and-loan associations to be used by home owners in that way; in other words, it will go through the building-and-loan associations rather than through this Government agency that is proposed to be set up in title II of the original bill.

I think title II should be put back into the bill; that the bill now under consideration should be made to conform to the bill originally introduced as proposed by the administration; and then, if there should be needed any material amendments, the committee should suggest them.

UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OPPONENT OF TITLE II

I have not read all the hearings, but I have read the testimony of most of the witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency. If I have read and understood the testimony correctly, no witness challenged title II until Mr. Harriman, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, appeared before the committee and said that title should be taken out of the bill; that we should not pass it in that form, and that he was sure it could not be passed in that form. Mr. Harriman, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, representative of big business, big financiers, and money lenders, was the first man who challenged title II. I do not intend to impugn the motives of anybody because they follow Mr. Harriman or because they believe what he says, but I am merely reciting the fact.

Also, Mr. Harriman said that he did not want interest rates to be too low; and he insisted that interest rates should be kept up. That is his testimony. He would not, therefore, want title II in this bill. I want to tell you that I want title II because I want the interest rate cheap; I want unemployment relieved, and I want homes built in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the title II regarding which Mr. Harriman was testifying is not title II of the bill under consideration.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, he talked as though it was.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. That title II is not the same title II of the bill under consideration.

Mr. PATMAN. His evidence indicates that he was talking about title II of the original act.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. If the gentleman would take the original draft submitted to us, the gentleman would find that the titles bearing the same number are different.

Mr. PATMAN. I am not in sympathy with Mr. Harriman's viewpoint. I have again examined Mr. Harriman's testimony, commencing at page 122 of the hearings, and I am confident that he was speaking of title II of the bill as introduced. Page 128 he says he does not believe the bill can be passed at this session with title II in it. Page 143 he advocates high interest rates. He wants the people to pay a high price for the use of their own credit. He does not want title II because it might cause the home owners to pay less interest on their home mortgages. If you are for high interest, vote with the United States Chamber of Commerce to leave the original title II out of this bill when Mr. SISSON offers an amendment to put it back.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion was not to strike out title II but was to strike out section 102 of title I. Therefore the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. PATMAN. Section 102 goes to the whole bill, for it creates the board and other machinery; and if this part falls, of course, the committee's amendment falls. That is the object of it, that the committee's amendment should fall; that is the reason I introduced my amendment, although I am not expecting it to be adopted at this time. I did not have any time in general debate, and I do not think the gentleman should be too contentious. I realize there are certain Members who do not like to hear the arguments I make here, and they do not like for the Federal Reserve banking racket to be exposed, but I feel the arguments should be made and I expect to continue to make them in the future as I have in the past.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. Under the provisions of original title II, the corporations proposed would have to raise a capital of $5,000,000 each before they could function.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. How many such companies does the gentleman feel there would be in the United States?

Mr. PATMAN. A large number of them would be organized. Let us support the administration by restoring title II and low-cost housing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to strike out section 102 of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 103. The Corporation is authorized and empowered, upon terms and under rules and regulations to be determined by the board of directors, to insure such banks, trust companies, personal finance companies, mortgage companies, building-and-loan associations, installment lending companies, and other financial institutions as may apply for credit insurance and be approved as eligible by the board of directors, against losses which may result to any such financial institutions in consequence of loans and advances of credit to real-estate owners, and purchasers of obligations representing loans and advances of credit to real-estate owners by such institutions made and entered into after the effective date of this act and prior to January 1, 1936, unless an earlier date is set by order of the President, for the purpose of enabling such owners of real estate to make alterations, repairs, and improvements thereto. The occupant or lessee of real estate, having a substantial interest, legal or equitable, therein, shall be deemed an owner within the meaning of this section. The power to insure granted herein shall be limited so that in no case shall the Corporation insure any financial institution against losses amounting to more than 20 percent of the total amount of loans made by it or credit advanced by it as above provided, nor incur a total liability for such insurance in excess of the aggregate par value of the Corporation's outstanding capital stock. It shall be a condition of the insurance that obligations representing loans and advances of credit to which the insurance applies shall not be for amounts in excess of $2,000, and shall bear interest, have maturities, and contain such other terms, conditions, and restrictions as the Corporation shall determine.

Mr. LANZETTA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANZETTA: Page 46, line 15, after the figures "$2,000", insert "except that in the case of low-cost housing—tenement houses—loans may be made up to an amount not exceeding $4,000."

Mr. LANZETTA. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to relieve unemployment and to help real-estate owners. The sum of $2,000 allowed under this bill for repairs, alterations, and improvements is entirely too low when applied to city tenements. We all know that most of the men who are employed in the building trades come from the cities, and we also know that most of the tenement owners in the big cities are in a bad way financially and that most tenements are in need of repairs. If we limit the sum for repairs, alterations, and improvements to $2,000, I am sure that not many of the tenement owners, dwellers, and building-trades employees in the cities will benefit.

I ask the Members of this House to support this amendment because I think that many tenement owners require this amount of money—$4,000—for improvements, and that only by stimulating and helping this type of work can we benefit the unemployed of the building trades who reside in our cities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LANZETTA].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LANZETTA) there were—ayes 41, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANZETTA. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANZETTA: On page 46, line 15, after the figures "$2,000", insert "except that in the case of low-cost housing (tenement houses) loans may be made up to an amount not to exceed $3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LANZETTA) there were—ayes 44, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 105. The Corporation is authorized and empowered at any time prior to July 1, 1937, upon terms and under rules and regulations to be determined by it, to insure amortized mortgages and like liens on owner-occupied homes, when presented by financial institutions approved as provided in section 103 of this title. Such insurance by the Corporation shall be based as far as practicable on the mutual principle so as to be self-supporting and involve no greater cost to mortgagors or mortgagees than that needed to cover the risk involved plus necessary administrative expenses. No such mortgages shall be insured on property having a present appraisal of more than $20,000, or which involved an original principal obligation in excess of 80 percent of the appraised value of the property offered as security therefor in the case of houses constructed since the passage of this act, or 60 percent of the appraised value of such property in the case of existing homes: Provided, That insurance of mortgages on existing homes shall be limited to an aggregate principal obligation on all such mortgages of not to exceed five times the aggregate par value of the Corporation's outstanding capital stock, and insurance of mortgages on homes constructed after the passage of this act shall be limited to a similar amount. The Corporation shall not insure mortgages when in the opinion of the Corporation speculative overbuilding will result.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PRALL: Page 47, line 6, after the word "homes", insert "or low-cost housing projects."

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, it will not be necessary, I am sure, to call attention to the importance of this amendment. I might go back to last December when the President called into conference many experts. These experts have worked during all of these months in order to perfect a plan, and from this plan the original bill introduced here and in the Senate was drawn.

There is no help here for cities or other parts of the country where slum clearance is necessary. There was not, I may say, very strong opposition to this section in the committee, and I hope the chairman of the committee will go along with me in this amendment.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. Will the gentleman please explain to us in what way he thinks slum clearance will be helped by the amendment?

Mr. PRALL. Slum clearance has been taken out of the bill entirely. It is simply a question of leaving it to this Corporation to determine in just what way and perhaps the best way to handle this situation. This is the first of three amendments that I propose to offer in making the correction.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BEEDY. If this amendment is adopted, I am wondering what it would really amount to in practice. If this amendment is adopted, would it not be up to the Corporation to decide how much money, if any, it should lend for this purpose?

Mr. PRALL. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The bill now permits of loans to home owners in slums, but if the gentleman remembers, we thought that perhaps the large property owners might seek heavy loans to build fine properties, and the poor man would get little, if any, benefit out of this provision.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will yield, this has nothing to do with making loans. This has to do with insuring mortgages.

Mr. PRALL. The gentleman means the same thing.

Mr. BEEDY. They have to be insured in the first place.

Mr. PRALL. The theory was that large apartment house promoters might be able to get relief and help through this proposition, but I am sure the corporation having charge of the administration of this act will not permit anything of that kind.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. May I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment says "or low-cost housing projects", so that the word "low" is in the amendment. It must be a low-cost house.

Mr. PRALL. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRALL. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. About what cost would the gentleman have in mind?

Mr. PRALL. I have no idea of the cost. I would leave that to the determination of the Corporation. Let them determine what a low housing project is. That is determined now in New York and other places. I would leave that to the Corporation.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The gentleman proposes an amendment here without any sort of limitation on the amount?

Mr. PRALL. The only limitation I propose is the good faith I have in the Corporation.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. My question was with respect to the amount of the loan.

Mr. PRALL. I am not afraid of that feature.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

As has already been suggested, there is in this bill a limitation of $2,000 on the mortgages which may be insured and now it is proposed, in the first place, by this amendment to throw wide open the doors without any limitation at all upon the amount which may be lent and upon which insurance may be had on low-cost housing projects. This is the first objection I have to the amendment.

There is a limitation upon the individual home owners of the country and yet there is absolutely no limitation at all in this amendment as applied to the big projects in the large cities.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not right now—I shall yield in a moment.

The proponent of this measure in his appearance before our committee admitted that in trying to write this provision into law he had changed it 30 or 40 times and when we tried to press him as to what this particular phrase meant, he himself, as the author of the measure and the proponent of it, was not able to tell us.

What does it mean? You cannot tell what it means.

Then, further, when we asked the proponent the very question that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] just asked here—what is your idea as to a low-cost housing project per unit—what is that low-cost housing project per family unit in these great, big apartments or these large establishments that are proposed to be insured under this amendment. The answer came back in that case, just as it did here—that he was not able to tell, but the witness on that occasion, who is the proponent and the man who is advocating it, when further pressed for an answer, his idea and his statement was that the low-cost housing per unit should not be less than $10,000.

If we are going to insure projects of this kind under this measure then the small home owner of the country will have no chance at all, and the primary purpose, I call to the attention of the members of the Committee, of this bill is to try to protect, so far as we can, the small home owners of the Nation, those who are most needy and most in distress.

In my opinion, the enactment of this amendment in large measure will throw down the bars and deprive those who are most in need of help of receiving the benefit which they should have under the bill.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman tell us what is to become of the tenement dweller of the city if you are not going to take care of him along with the private home owners?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The tenement owners?

Mr. LANZETTA. I refer to the tenement dwellers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill also provides for renovation and improvement within the limits prescribed.

Mr. SISSON. For tenements?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; tenements.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANZETTA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRALL. Would the gentleman bar the rent payer? Does the gentleman put the rent payer in a different category from the home owner as one entitled to consideration by us?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I concede there may be some such claim, provided you can write into this legislation limitations that can be practicably enforced and applicable to this situation. I do submit that the amendment of the gentleman from New York does not do this, and the members of the committee were absolutely opposed to the proposition for the reason it is not practical and it throws wide open the doors so far as this insurance and so far as the loans are concerned upon which such insurance may be made.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman from New York, in his question, forgets the purpose of the bill, which is to encourage building. Rent payers cannot borrow to build unless they have a long-term lease, and rent payers in the slums do not have a long-term lease; in other words, they are not home owners.

Mr. PRALL. The gentleman from New York understands the purposes of the bill.

Mr. BEEDY. But for the moment the gentleman lost sight of the purpose, I suggest.

Mr. PRALL. Not for a moment.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman does not contend that the rent payer can come in under the terms of this bill and cause any building to be done?

Mr. PRALL. I may tell the gentleman from Maine that I believe the rent payer is just as much entitled to decent living conditions as the home owner.

Mr. BEEDY. There is no question about that and nobody denies that.

Mr. PRALL. And simply because we cannot place a limitation on this particular part of the bill should not bar the rent payer, whoever he may be, who is perhaps in a poorer class than the home owner, from having decent living accommodations.

Mr. BEEDY. Absolutely not. There is no question about that.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that in all legislation, both for the home owners in the municipalities and for the farm owners in the country, there has been a limitation on the amount that may be obtained from any of these organizations?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is absolutely correct and that is the objection we have to this amendment. So far we have not been able to make any determination about that, and so far as the gentleman who wrote the original provision in this law is concerned, as I said a while ago, he himself could not suggest to our Committee any language which would cover the situation and put a limitation upon it, which, in our opinion, is absolutely necessary in order to preserve this legislation in the interest of those for whom it is intended.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will attempt what that gentleman could not do. In the Public Works Act we have a provision for low-cost housing. I should not imagine anyone did not know what low-cost housing is. It runs between $6 and $12 a room, depending on the locality. This is known to the world and in every housing project submitted to the Public Works Administration they figure in New York from $6 to a room to $8 a room in some places depending on the locality.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I want to ask the gentleman if the witness to whom he referred did not fix the rental at $40 a month?

Mr. O'CONNOR. They fixed it $11 per month per room.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Look at the record.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, he made a mistake.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, permit me to inform the House the Public Works Administration recognized the appeal of public-spirited citizens of St. Louis, who advanced money, came to Washington, and were recognized under the Public Works Administration Act to construct a low-cost housing project.

Last week the ground was broken in my district for that project, and there is not one person who will occupy an apartment in that low-cost housing project that would be able to benefit under this act unless the pending amendment is adopted; not one, because they do not make the money necessary to enable them to benefit under the act. Are we to forget those who do not make enough to build but must rent? I think the act could be so worded as to take care of the tenants as well as the home owner. [Applause.]

Now, I should like the attention of the chairman of the committee a moment. I have a telegram that appeals to me to support the housing act. The sender says it is a splendid piece of legislation. But he wants me to consider carefully section 105 of title 1 and hopes there will be discussion and a record vote on striking out that section, which provides unfair competition for community thrift and home-financing institutions by providing insurance for existing individual mortgages. And he says without this section it will amply carry out the President's program and aid greatly in business recovery. It is signed by Axel Hawkinson, president.

Will the gentleman explain to me why this section is unfair?

Mr. STEAGALL. I did not quite catch the provision to which the telegram applies. Is it for the new home-construction or existing homes?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is that language relating to insurance for existing individual mortgages. The telegram says that is unfair competition for community thrift and home-financing institutions. Is that in the bill advocated by the President?

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In that event I see it is useless to even advocate striking out the language referred to because both the committee and those advocating the original bill are against it.

While I am on my feet I want to say that I feel it is our duty here to so word this bill that it will put the skilled mechanic to work. Coming from a large city I am aware of the situation confronting the men engaged in building homes and construction work of all kinds. The building trades are suffering as they never suffered before. They are in actual need; many on relief rolls, others supported by their organizations. In advocating this legislation the President not only had in mind proper housing for the people but he also was aware it would give employment to men in the building trades. This is one of the most important pieces of legislation considered at this session. It is a real step toward recovery.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, the language offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL], a distinguished member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, restores to this bill, on page 47, the language "and low-cost housing projects." That language was contained in the original administration bill, but the words were stricken out by the committee. Why, we have not heard. We now propose to restore these words as we also propose to restore title II to the bill, as it was sent here by the administration and which title was stricken out by the committee. Why, we have not yet heard. Those are the two big issues before this House. The question is whether or not these two provisions shall stay in the bill. We men from the metropolitan sections of the country are not selfish about this matter. I have been in this Congress for six terms, and no man can mention a farm-relief measure from the McNary-Haugen bill, the stabilization fund, the debenture plan, or any other farm relief that I and most of the Members from the big cities have not enthusiastically supported. Please do not forget that recently we supported the Bankhead cotton bill, the tobacco bill, the drought relief bill—in fact every bill to aid the farmer and the small communities.

We have a difficult situation in our cities—not in Chicago, not in New York, not in St. Louis alone, but also in the smaller cities like, for instance, Elizabeth, N.J., or Buffalo, N.Y., even cities of only 50,000 people. All our cities are interested in the proposal for low-cost housing. There is no mystery about what low-cost housing means. I just stated it to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], but he, being against the program of the administration, refused to listen.

Mr. SIROVICH. And is it not a fact that unless the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRALL] is agreed to, it will be absolutely impossible to replace slums in New York City or any city?

Mr. O'CONNOR. In any city, large or small. There is no mystery about what "low-cost housing" means. It is well defined. It means slum-clearance projects where the rents per room are low enough so that the people who rent them can pay the rent. Those rents run from $6 to $11 per room, with $8 as the average point at which most of the authorities aim. Under this bill this Board has as complete control over the prices per room to be charged as the Public Works had when it pretended to pass on many housing projects, which that Board, in its whim and fancy, never intended to see through. If the rents proposed are too high, the Board will not approve of the project. "Forty dollars" a room, as suggested by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], must be an error. Forty dollars a "tenement" would even be an error, because these tenements average about three rooms each, and the rents should not exceed a total of $25 per month. You have a provision in the bill to insure the amortized mortgages on homes worth not more than $20,000. Well, a $20,000 home is quite a home. Twenty thousand dollars on an average throughout this country is quite a home. The committee seems to have no reluctance in insuring a "home" or shall we say "mansion", worth that amount. The Government is not "lending" money under the bill. Lending on mortgage is provided for under the Home Owners' Loan Act. This bill provides for insuring amortized mortgages on homes, and all we ask you to do is where Federal or city agencies or special corporations created by the State, with limited dividends and other restrictions, build housing projects and issue amortizing mortgages, that the money be used to insure those mortgages within the limitations applying to other homes, insured in this bill. What objection can there be to that?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I believe the feeling on the part of the Members from the West as to the record of the gentleman from New York and his sympathetic attitude toward their legislation is exactly what he says it is and I do not believe the opposition to this title II comes from that section.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am sure the gentleman is correct. Surely the Members from farm districts which we have consistently helped will not now forsake us "city fellows."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It seems to me that it is coming from some of the big Eastern cities.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know that, but I do know this that, opposition to title II being left in the bill cannot come from anybody who claims in the smallest degree to support this administration. Their lip service will not do. This debate will be the test as to who are the real supporters of the administration.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I have heard some of them get up here from the popular centers of the East and express thanks that title II is stricken from the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I fear they represented building-and-loan associations as counsel or otherwise. Speaking of title II for the moment, we propose to restore that title to the bill. If it is not restored to the bill, and if this provision as to low-cost housing is not put back in the bill then I call upon the administration supporters to vote against the passage of the bill, as I shall vote against its passage. [Applause.] I want to see the committee do the fair thing by the Democratic majority of this House. Unless the committee accepts this amendment for low-cost housing and, also, accepts the restoration of title II, that committee is not faithful to the administration, nor is it faithful to the Democratic majority of this House, to the 313 Democrats of which that committee is but an arm, or an agent.

Mr. CONNERY. And outside of the purely financial aspect of this situation there is the tremendously important health feature to the people, to give them a chance to live in a decent place.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, it is much more important to clean up a slum in one of our cities than it is to put a new front porch on a home in Squeedunk, or an electric ice box on the back porch, as title I proposes to do—take your choice. I hope this amendment for low-cost housing will be agreed to, as the President wishes it to be.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, doubtless there is no Member of the House who does not sympathize with the reform known as "slum clearance." Granting that we would all like to help along this reform in which we have made slower progress than the countries of the Old World, yet there remains the question of how it should be done. Members of your committee, by a large majority, reached the conclusion that this is not the time and place to do it, and for these reasons: First, this measure is one to give immediate relief to the building industry, and its particulars have been planned with the greatest care to secure quick relief. Slum clearance is one of the slowest measures upon which we could embark. As a rule, it takes 6 months, if not much longer, to clear up titles. It then takes many months to execute the contracts, and those of you who have watched post-office construction programs throughout the country are well aware that this could bring no help to the construction trade until next year or possibly the year after.

Secondly, however admirable this reform, it is not a reform that should be undertaken by the Federal Government. It is a problem for the States and for the cities. It is conspicuous that the argument so far presented has chiefly come from the richest city in the world, unless London excels it. It comes from a city which, by making the request, acknowledges its incapacity to meet its own problems, and it calls upon distressed sections of the country to contribute to a program that ought to be carried out by the city of New York itself.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. When I have finished my remarks.

Furthermore, it is not a reform that will be of service to the great masses of the people. I am informed that the Prudential Life Insurance Co. has recently, in the depression, undertaken the erection in Newark of such structures as are here contemplated, and has been unable to provide them without loss at a monthly rental of less than $10 a room. Now, that is $50 a month for a family occupying five rooms, and that is $600 a year. Rental takes one-fifth of the family income. Therefore, apartments furnished by this program are not of service to anybody with an income of less than $3,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has expired.

Mr. LUCE. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PATMAN. Reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, the gentleman is making a very persuasive argument to one not fully informed as to the facts and conditions, and I always like to hear him, but I am afraid the gentleman is making the kind of an argument that was made in the committee that persuaded the committee to not destroy a good administration bill, but to take from the administration bill one of the very vital sections.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. PATMAN. Reserving the right to object—I had not finished. The regular order has not been called for. I hope the gentleman will be as considerate in the future of my request as I am of his.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIROVICH. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. SIROVICH. In the district that I represent in Congress we have the worst kind of slum districts. There are over 40 acres where people live in slums that were condemned 40 years ago, and they are paying a rental of $8 or $9 or $10 a week today. Is my distinguished friend willing to go on record as saying it would not be better to tear them down and give those people a wholesome, clean house at $10?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated that the demand comes largely from the city of New York. Therefore I would like to say that the city of Pittsburgh heartily endorses this amendment.

Mr. LUCE. The need of slum clearance is evident in all cities. I pointed out merely that it was most conspicuous from New York, and to my good friend from New York who interrogated me a moment ago I would say, as I said in the beginning, that we are in complete and full sympathy with his purpose and his desires. We believe the thing ought to be done, and we believe his city ought to do it.

Mr. SIROVICH. But the banks control these mortgages. They take them away from people whose equity has been lost, and they do not, because of their condition, rebuild those slums. The gentleman is making a speech now that will preserve those slums for a hundred years more. This is the time to wipe them out all over the country. We are not asking for any grant from the Federal Government, but will pay it back as the years will give us a chance to amortize it.

Mr. LUCE. I do not desire to enter into any discussion of the details of this program. I still say it is the right, the duty, the opportunity, and within the power of the city of New York to clean up its own slums.

Mr. LANZETTA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. LANZETTA. Does the gentleman know that most banks in New York City refuse to make any loans on mortgages in the so-called "slum districts"?

Mr. LUCE. May I ask if they will refuse to make those mortgages after you have destroyed your slums?

Mr. LANZETTA. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. Will they not make mortgages on real estate if the land has been cleared?

Mr. LANZETTA. Not in certain sections. They refuse absolutely.

Mr. SIROVICH. If they will clear them, they will give loans.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a student of this subject. This particular section is not to loan money to New York City or anybody else. If New York City has its city-housing corporation and furnishes the money and loans the money to somebody else in an amortizing mortgage, all this section does is to allow this Board to insure those amortizing mortgages.

No money comes out of the Federal Treasury to build that housing project in New York. Now, is not that the situation?

Mr. LUCE. But it is no more pertinent to this bill than would be a provision to insure mortgages on factories or any kind of commercial structures.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But these are places where people live; this is a housing proposition.

Mr. LUCE. And this is a proposition for the man of small means, for those who are suffering most in this emergency, not for the man who earns $3,000 a year and can pay $10 a room a month rental for his home.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The tenants in New York are largely men of small means, men who cannot pay $10 a room per month rental. These men do not make $3,000 a year. The average working man in New York City does not make over $25 a week.

Mr. LUCE. Therefore, it is proved conclusively that these apartments will not be occupied by the poor people of whom the gentleman speaks, but that they will be occupied by the well-to-do.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They will not be occupied by the well-to-do; they will be occupied by laboring men who usually pay 25 percent of their income for rent, which would be $25 per month for three rooms at $8.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LUCE. Surely.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of my colleague, who casts aspersions upon the great State and city of New York, that when Boulder Dam, Muscle Shoals, Mississippi flood control, and Federal farm relief came before Congress 29 Members of the New York delegation voted in behalf of relief for those sections of the country. We make the plea today that the Members from those sections help us get rid of these slums, which for 140 years have not been cleared up.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman if the same delegation of 29 New York Members voted unanimously to unload the Erie Canal on the Federal Government?

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. I would suggest that it might help the people of the city of New York in alleviating the slum problem if the gentleman wrote a song for them on that subject.

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes; I will write a song; and in that song I shall stress the justice of removing this evil.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, it is entirely proper that the opposition to this particular amendment should come principally from the minority. On last Friday there was read the message of the President of the United States in which the President outlined perhaps the greatest humanitarian problem that has ever been presented to any legislative body. One feature of that program was proper housing for the people of this country, and it is entirely proper that from this side of the aisle we should hear the argument advanced: "That may be all right, but this is not the proper time or place to do it."

Was there ever a better time to give decent housing conditions to the people of the cities of this country than right now? [Applause.]

I say frankly to some of those whom I opposed yesterday: "You are here voting on a vital part of the President's program." Yesterday I voted against a part that was not in his program. It is true that the chairman of the committee brought in a letter purporting to give the recommendation of the President to that particular minor feature; but it was not a part of the constructive recovery program.

As the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] said earlier today, the whole meat of the housing program is bound up in section 2 and in the slum-clearance features of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to say to those who yesterday were calling on me to follow the President's recommendation, that I am going to be watching them when they vote on this feature, because this is close to the President's heart. This is the third point in the three-point program that he laid before us the other day when he said that old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and proper housing for our people shall be the future goal of the recovery program.

The argument that this helps solely the city of New York ought to get no consideration from the membership of the House, because, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that whenever there is an unemployed man in New York he cannot buy the tobacco raised in the State of Kentucky, and so long as there are hungry, penniless families in the slum districts of New York they cannot buy the food products raised on Minnesota farms. This country has got to go forward, not by districts, not by sections, but as a united whole; and this is the program the President has laid before us and asked us to put forward. I trust the Members from the far reaches of the West will join today with those who represent the more crowded sections, the cities where are found the slums—they will join with us to amend this bill that we may carry out the original intent of the President; restore the bill to the form it was before it was gutted by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Supplementing the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, permit me to call attention to the fact that in the matter of the processing tax, there was collected in New York $31,847,000 for the benefit of the farmer. How much of this do you think we got back? We got back $55,000.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it was my vote on the Committee on Rules that unloaded the Cape Cod Canal on the United States Government.

Mr. SIROVICH. May I say for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts that it was my vote in the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries that helped give millions to Massachusetts for their poor fishermen.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 79, noes 74.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. STEAGALL and Mr. PRALL.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 102, noes 76.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PRALL: On page 47, line 13, strike out the word "such" and insert in lieu thereof the word "home."

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a perfecting and companion amendment to the one the Committee has just voted on.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of obtaining some information. We are putting in the word "home", and in view of the conditions that exist in many sections of our country there are a great many buildings that are occupied by the owners that are not properly classified as "homes." Does not the gentleman think it would be better if we would use the word "buildings" in lieu of the word "home"?

Mr. PRALL. No; this simply restores to the individual homes the limitation of $20,000.

Mr. SABATH. I understand that.

Mr. PRALL. And it allows an interpretation of the amendment we have just passed in the low-cost housing projects to go without limit. It simply continues the limit originally intended at $20,000 for the individual home.

Mr. SABATH. Under the present act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation refuses to make loans upon buildings.

Mr. PRALL. Why does not the gentleman offer an amendment to change that in some other way?

Mr. SABATH. I am simply trying to expedite matters.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will permit, the original bill as it came from the administration had in it language that the $20,000 appraisal pertained to homes, so that that limitation would not be on the low-cost housing projects. Under the Home Owners' Loan Act, a home is defined as a place where the owner lives and not more than two additional families, or, I believe, limits it to three families. This is interpreted as a home upon which the $20,000 appraisal is based. Over and above three families, it is not within the definition of a home.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I had in mind, and I think that should be corrected in this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I think I can clarify what is in the gentleman's mind by a question. The purpose of this is to allow the construction of million-dollar rabbit warrens, is it not?

Mr. SABATH. No.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, a $20,000 limitation on a slum-clearance project would be useless, but on a home a $20,000 limitation is quite magnificent.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman wants to replace the slums with the kind of thing they had in Vienna where they shot them down.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know. I was never so fortunate as to travel, as the gentleman has.

Mr. LUCE. Oh, there were pictures in the papers of those places.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The effect of this amendment is to leave a limitation of $20,000 on homes without any limitation whatsoever on other property.

Mr. PRALL. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when he strikes out the word "such", in line 13, page 47, he removes the word which modifies the kind of mortgage or lien on which there shall be a limitation. That word refers to the language in line 6 where it says that the corporation is authorized and empowered upon terms and rules and regulations to be determined by it to insure amortize mortgages and like liens on owner-occupied homes. Now, there is a class of liens which does not come within the classification of a mortgage, and if you remove the word "such" and put in "home", you remove the effect of the limitation of the $20,000 provided for in line 14.

I am going to suggest to the gentleman that to accomplish the purpose of his amendment and still keep the limitation as it was intended in the original draft, he should eliminate the word "such" and after the word "mortgages" he should insert "and like liens on owner-occupied homes."

So the language will read, "No mortgages or like liens on owner-occupied homes shall be insured", and so forth. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. It should read, "No home mortgages or like liens on owner-occupied homes." Otherwise, you will not have the purpose of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York: Page 47, line 13, strike out the word "such", and, after the word "mortgages" insert "and like liens on owner-occupied homes."

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have the floor.

Mr. EDMONDS. I received a communication from the proprietors of a project that involves an expenditure between forty and forty-five million dollars. They were proposing to borrow from the Public Works Administration. Do you suppose under this they are going to receive an insured mortgage?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think under the amendment accepted by the Committee there is no limit to the amount for insurance for low-cost housing, but there still is a limit on the amount of insurance on owner-occupied home mortgages and liens.

Mr. EDMONDS. And the $45,000,000 project would come in under this and be insured?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand there is no limit under the amendment just adopted.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman does not mean that it would not be limited by the $20,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the substitute was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PRALL: After the word "result" add a new section, as follows:

"The corporation may also insure mortgages on property held by (1) Federal or State instrumentalities created for the purpose of providing housing for persons of low income or (2) corporations created for the purpose of providing housing for persons of low incomes which are regulated either by law or by the corporation as to rents, charges, capital structure, rate of return, or methods of operation."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. GLOVER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 9620 and had come to no resolution thereon.

SERVICE OF CHAIRMAN M'SWAIN

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. MCSWAIN, Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and to include therein a resolution adopted by the committee this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I believe in according praise to those who have faithfully and conscientiously done their duty. Therefore, I was very happy when Representative EWING THOMASON, of Texas, offered a resolution in the Committee on Military Affairs expressing the estimate of that committee of the services of its chairman [Mr. MCSWAIN]. This resolution was unanimously adopted, and my personal feeling is that it inadequately expresses the feeling of the individual members of the committee toward our chairman. Mr. MCSWAIN's devotion to duty, his consideration for all members of the committee, irrespective of party, his courtesy, and his fairness as a presiding officer, have endeared him in our affections.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the least I can do to assist in recording the opinion of the Committee concerning the services of our chairman is to ask that the resolution of the Committee be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. Furthermore, I venture to express the belief that this estimate of the services of Mr. MCSWAIN, expressed by the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, would also be the estimate, opinion, and judgment of all Members of this House, if they were asked to express their feelings.

I now insert the resolution, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs.

JUNE 12, 1934.

Resolution offered by Mr. THOMASON, of Texas

As this is probably the last general meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-third Congress, we deem it proper to record upon the minutes of this committee our estimate of the services of our chairman, the Honorable JOHN J. MCSWAIN. We testify most sincerely to the soundness of his judgment, to the fairness of his rulings, and to the unflagging industry with which he has pressed the work of the committee. While our chairman is a man of firm convictions and fearless in their expression, yet he is courteous, considerate, and fair to all who differ in opinion from him. He gives every interest patient and full opportunity for hearing and has never sought to force his own opinions upon the committee as a whole or upon any individual member thereof. That he has the confidence of every Member of the House of Representatives is shown by the fact that the resolution by Mr. McSWAIN, authorizing this committee to conduct investigations into War Department financial transactions, was unanimously passed by the House, and subsequently a resolution putting at his disposal, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts, the sum of $10,000 to defray the expenses of such investigation, and both said resolutions passed the House of Representatives without a single dissenting vote on either side.

Since such resolutions were passed, investigations have been vigorously, intelligently, but fairly conducted under his general supervision, and may result in returning to the Treasury of the United States large sums of money, and most probably will result in such legislation and regulations in the future as to save to the Treasury of the United States, even in the next few years, during the probable expansion of the air-defense program, many millions of dollars. Therefore, be it Resolved by said Committee on Military Affairs, That the thanks of this committee are due to our chairman, the Honorable JOHN J. McSWAIN, for his fidelity to duty, for his laborious discharge of the work of his office, for his zealous efforts to enforce economy without sacrificing efficiency, for his progressive and sincere efforts to promote the cause of national defense in all of its aspects and relations, and for the kindness, courtesy, and fairness with which he has presided over their deliberations.

Unanimously adopted June 12, 1934, by Committee on Military Affairs.

Attest:

KENNETH ANDERSON, Clerk.

SOME PHASES OF THE NEW DEAL

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating in the RECORD an address delivered by our colleague the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. ROBERTSON, at Richmond University.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, of Virginia, before the General Alumni Society of the University of Richmond on the evening of June 11, 1934:

Mr. President, honored trustees, and fellow alumni, the best evidence of my appreciation of the honor of being invited to address you tonight is the fact that I am here. When I protested to the distinguished president of the General Alumni Society that my duties in Congress were so strenuous I would have no opportunity to prepare an address worthy of such an occasion, he suggested that without preparation and in an informal way I could give you tonight some of my impressions of the new deal.

If, therefore, I may be exonerated of violating the proprieties of the occasion, I will undertake to present to you some phases of the new deal; and not, I hope, in a purely political or partisan manner, but rather after the manner of an observer of political and social trends. In attempting to evaluate the various phases of the new deal I realize that I lack perspective, and likewise that I am not without a certain amount of bias. Since March of 1933 I can say, like Ulysses of old: "Many things have I seen—a part of which I was." No doubt many of you who have viewed the work of the present administration from a distance have a better conception of what has been done than some of us who have been in the thick of the fight. The soldier in the ranks makes a poor historian of the battle; but, at any rate, I will be glad to give you some of the impressions I have gained in Washington.

I went to Washington in March 1933 with the very definite idea that I was a liberal. Teddy Roosevelt was engaged in his trust-busting activities when I was studying Woodrow Wilson's State under that great liberal thinker and inspirational teacher, Dr. S. C. Mitchell. My first political activity was as a Woodrow Wilson delegate to our State convention in Norfolk in the summer of 1912. In the Chicago platform of 1932 and in the compaign speeches of Franklin D. Roosevelt, I felt that there was a revival, after 12 years of reactionary policies, of the liberalism of Woodrow Wilson. You may, therefore, imagine my surprise after a few months' service in the House to find myself classified as a conservative, and I am still so classified by my colleagues, notwithstanding the fact that I have supported the President's entire recovery program.

I mention this for the purpose of focusing your attention upon the fact that the President is more conservative than the Congress. The economy act was passed by a narrow margin and at the earnest solicitation of the President. Most of the savings of that act were at this session wiped out by a bill that was passed over his veto. The bill providing for the immediate cash payment of the bonus and coupled with the issuance of $2,000,000,000 of paper currency without any metal base was passed by the House in spite of a certain Presidential veto. During the special session, the Congress passed a much broader currency bill than the President had recommended, conferring upon him three-way currency inflation powers, only one of which he has so far used. If time permitted, I could cite you numerous instances in support of my assertion that the Congress has been restrained by the President from taking action that by many would be called radical.

When we came to Washington in March 1933 a great fear had possessed the hearts of many of our captains of industry. During those first stabilizing months they voiced no criticism of anything the President proposed, and in the House we had the heartiest support of our colleagues on the Republican side. Now, that the dangers that confronted us in 1933 have been successfully passed, there is criticism of the program from some business interests and from many Republican leaders. One Republican Congressman from New York even came to Richmond a few weeks ago to voice his criticism of the program and to charge the Congressmen from Virginia with paying lip service only to Thomas Jefferson. It is rather amusing to see the Representative of a silk-stocking, dyed-in-the-wool New York Republican district coming to Virginia as the true exponent of Jeffersonian principles. The essence of Jeffersonian democracy is that the welfare of the masses is entitled to prior consideration. Therefore, we find him writing in his immortal declaration, with respect to certain inalienable rights of the masses, that: "Whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its power in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." That thought was paraphrased by Lincoln in his first inaugural address when he said: "This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing Government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it."

And it was of Lincoln, the founder of the Republican Party, that the New York World in 1863 said: "The administration shines, like the moon, by reflected light. It borrows its ideas and policies, as far as it has any, from these crazy radicals. By surrendering itself to their wild, reckless guidance it is ruining the country." And yet it is to Lincoln, the believer in the welfare of the masses, that this Nation has erected in Washington a $3,000,000 memorial—the most costly monument ever erected to any public servant in the United States.

The conditions that existed in this country in 1933 are still too fresh in the minds of all to need repetition, but they must be borne in mind if we are to interpret properly the steps taken to correct them. When I was nominated to Congress in September 1932 I wrote my old Richmond College history teacher for suggestions as to a program for congressional action. I knew that he was honest, that he was a deep student of government and social trends, and I likewise regarded him as a worthy exponent of Jeffersonian democracy. These are some of the suggestions that he made to me on September 16, 1932:

"1. Unchoke the channels of trade—

"(a) By reducing tariffs:

"(b) By a trade agreement with Russia. (I favor recognition of Russia.)

"(c) By adjusting interallied debts. (I favor virtual cancelation of war debts in spite of our platform.)

"2. Strengthen our domestic situation—

"(a) By reform of our banking system. In the United States in the last 10 years there have been over 10,000 bank failures. In England, none; and in Canada, 1. What more need be said?

"(b) By wise Federal control of the stock exchanges.

"(c) By revival of supervision by State Department of foreign stocks and bonds.

"(d) By State unemployment insurance, by a small charge upon (1) employers, (2) workers, and (3) States.

"3. Create good will in Latin America—

"(a) By withdrawing marines from Haiti, Nicaragua, etc.

"(b) By discouraging economic exploitation of Latin America by our bankers and big business.

"4. Independence for Philippines within 8 years.

"5. Reduction of the Budget for—

"(a) Army and Navy consolidation of Army, Navy, and Air Force in one Department of National Defense.

"(b) By reorganizing bureaus and commissions of Federal Government.

"These may suggest things essential. Our economic order is breaking down. The crisis demands change. We can control change. Our hand is on the throttle.

"If our statesmen do not guide changes now, we must expect revolution. Ten million men out of work means that."

I know that every alumnus of Richmond College is gratified that virtually every one of the suggestions made to me in September 1932 by a Richmond College professor have subsequently been incorporated into what we call the "new deal."

That brings me to my first definite impression of the new deal, which is its insistence upon honesty in both governmental and business operations; honesty in our dealings with the peoples of foreign nations, both large and small; honesty in our banking and currency; honesty in the dealings between employer and employee; and honesty in the dealings between producer and consumer. If we are to build an enduring social system, it must have its foundation in common honesty.

The effect of our depression was intensified by dishonesty that permeated both Government and business and destroyed confidence. We lost confidence in the sincerity of officials in high place; we lost confidence in our banks and bankers; we lost confidence in the application of the fundamental rules of social justice; and both as individuals and as a nation we engaged in the ruthless game, as the Secretary of the Interior recently said, of "catch-as-catch-can." One of the purposes of the new deal is to restore confidence and good will between individuals and between this Nation and the other nations of the world. That progress has been made in that undertaking cannot be denied. As a Nation we have improved our status with our Latin-American countries by the Montevideo Conference, the freeing of the Philippines, the treaty with Cuba, including the reduction of our duty on Cuban sugar, and the withdrawal of our marines from Central America. The passage of the Reciprocal Trade Treaty Act should enable us to establish more friendly relations with other nations and to take steps to unchoke the channels of commerce. We have confidence in the national credit, as is evidenced by the fact that all Government bonds, whether issued directly by the Treasury or merely guaranteed by the Government, are selling above par. Confidence in our banks has been restored, and we now have on deposit in them more currency than ever before in the history of the Nation. While the present relationship between capital and labor leaves much to be desired, Walter Lippman assures us that after each depression labor strikes have been the harbinger of returning prosperity.

In our efforts to meet the great national crisis, I frankly admit that certain restrictions have been placed upon individual action, but where the individual has been restricted it has been for the purpose of promoting equality of opportunity. I call your attention to the fact that every such restrictive law, or law of regimentation if you please, is expressly designated as emergency legislation and specifically limited as to duration. In other words, the restrictive laws, especially the A.A.A. and the N.R.A., have been experiments. I have not personally approved of everything contained in every bill nor seek now to commend, in every detail, the manner of their administration. I have confidence that even before they expire of their own limitation the President will abandon the features of the recovery acts that are found to be impractical.

The new deal has accomplished more tangible results for agriculture than any previous Federal program. There are two factors in the agricultural problem that make it extremely difficult to deal with. One is the law of supply and demand, that outranks the laws of Congress, and the other is the fact that export farm commodities are not a domestic but an international problem. The farm commodities that have been named as basic commodities have been so named and regulated at the request of those who produce them. Ninety-five percent of the cotton growers petitioned for the enactment of the Bankhead bill.

The cotton growers of America in the spring of 1934 faced a carry-over crop sufficient not only to supply our domestic needs but our potential export market without 1 pound of new cotton being produced. Without curtailment, there was prospect for a 14,000,000-bale crop for 1934, the production of which would have meant 6-cent cotton, or less. The cotton farmers petitioned Congress to enact a law that would limit the 1934 production to 10,000,000 bales. The tobacco growers of Virginia are seeking a compulsory reduction law of a somewhat similar character. My belief is that an adjustment to market requirements, regulation of commodity exchanges, better distribution of farm crops, the refinancing of existing farm mortgages at a lower rate of interest, and the lowering of the value of the dollar in foreign exchange will help to improve rural conditions. The real farm recovery will not come until we have regained our foreign markets as an outlet for our surplus production. We do not have the gift of prophecy nor can we pierce the veil of the future. Nature can set at naught our best laid plans for arbitrary control. I likewise believe in a maximum of personal liberty and private initiative, consistent with the welfare of the whole. There would be no food shortage in Russia if the peasant farmer were permitted to produce for private sale and personal profit.

Some of our western farmers seem to think that their recovery hinges upon the issuance of seven or eight billions of greenbacks or the remonetization of silver. Bob Ingersoll said that he wanted every greenback to be able to stand on end and say: "I know that my redeemer liveth." And what Cleveland told the Congress in his message of August 9, 1893, concerning unsound money is just as true now as then. It is not the amount of currency in circulation but the velocity of circulation that makes prosperous times. Our banks are bursting with currency now but it has no velocity of circulation. The banks have enough currency to justify new bank credits of 100 billion dollars.

Our farm program has been imperfect, but at least the new deal stopped the process of deflation and bankruptcy. Our National Recovery Act has not worked uniformly well but it has put men to work, under better working conditions, and it has promoted a higher code of ethics in business dealings. These are two phases of the new deal that have been criticized.

Federal expenditures is another phase of the new deal that is being criticized. Roger Babson says the Republicans subsidized industry and the Democrats are subsidizing unemployment. Personally, I believe in what President Cleveland said in his message returning, without his signature, a bill for the relief of Alabama cotton growers, sponsored by the father of the present Senator BANKHEAD. In refusing to approve the appropriation, Cleveland said: "It is the duty of the citizen to support the Government and not the duty of the Government to support the citizen." But our vast public expenditures have not been to support citizens but to keep citizens from starving. In the famous British debt repudiation case Patrick Henry said: "There is no law of the land higher than the law of necessity." There could be no higher necessity than the feeding of the hungry. It is better to feed the hungry through means of honest employment than through a dole. Again I ask you to recall what Dr. Mitchell wrote me in the fall of 1932—10,000,000 unemployed and what we could expect if they could not get work.

Edmund Burke, a great statesman, said that nations do not learn by experience. Apparently some individuals do not either. Nations have learned little about peace from the experience of war. The ruling class of Russia learned little about social justice from the hardship and suffering of millions of serfs and peasants. Of some of those sent into exile it has been said: "Only in future years when their sins have taught them charity, and their despair has taught them hope, and their loneliness has led them to faith, they shall listen again to the sound of bells coming across the fields and comprehend and reverence the symbolism of the cross."

We want in America a social order that can comprehend and reverence the symbolism of the cross; a social order in which the individual who while free from compulsory regimentation and enjoying a maximum of personal liberty is nevertheless a self-disciplined member of society, trained under the principles of our great Confederate leader, who said: "Teach the child to deny himself"—and who not through compulsion but of his volition is regardful of the rights of others. We want a social order in which the youth of the land, as Webster said, "will be imbued with a fear of God and a love for their fellow man." If any citizen of the United States feels that the present vast expenditures of the Federal Government, made as I have indicated above to relieve distress and to overcome the worst economic depression of history, is but the commencement of the overthrow of President Cleveland's theory that it is the duty of the citizen to support the Government, he has misconstrued the social implications of the new deal. The Royal Bank of Canada in its June survey of recovery in the United States during the last year said that it "is an amazing spectacle to the outside world. With an increase of about 25 percent in commodity prices and 100 percent in security prices", the bank declares, "the index of business activity in March 1934 was carried 44 percent above that of the previous March." But every sane man must realize that governmental operation alone cannot win the war against depression. As Goldsmith remarked, "Of all of the ills that human hearts endure, how small that part which kings or laws can cause or cure." Our future economic destiny lies in our own hands. By honesty, industry, and frugality, and by those actions alone, we can and should rebuild our lost fortunes.

And to those critics of the new deal who point with alarm to prospective fiat money and financial chaos I recall the solemn promise of our great leader that the emergency expenditures are emergency expenditures and not permanent commitments, and that in the preparation of our National Budget for 1936 we will balance our Budget, not on a special set of ledgers but in fact, and thenceforth live within our current revenue. As I have supported our President in the other features of the new-deal plan, so will I support him, if then a Member of the House, in the fulfillment of that solemn promise to the American people. That, my friends, will be the crisis of the new deal.

When only 72 Members of the House were loyal to the policies of the President, the Virginia delegation was united and stood shoulder to shoulder in upholding his hands. And when the big crisis comes in 1935 in the preparation of a sane and sound Budget, I predict that again the Virginia delegation will be found on the firing line, putting patriotism and the general welfare of the Nation before selfish demands and radical policies. And to that consummation of a new-deal program to give us a more abundant life in a thoroughly American manner I call upon every loyal son of Richmond College here and now mutually to pledge to each other, as did our forefathers in the trying times of '76, our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to incorporate therein a eulogy on our late colleague, Judge Almon, of Alabama, by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GILLESPIE].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE COLLIER PLAN FOR THE INDIAN'S NEW DEAL WILL PLUNGE THE RACE INTO DEEPER MAZES OF RED TAPE

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a telegram I received protesting against the Wheeler-Howard bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the Wheeler-Howard bill, better known as the "Collier bill", are more detrimental to Indian welfare, more autocratic in control, and more dangerous than anything which has gone before in the 100 years past, that the first Americans have been held as prisoners of war.

There are at present individuals on the Indian reservations throughout America who were quick to see that they might profit personally at the expense of the Five Civilized and other tribes of Indians if the provisions of the Collier proposed legislation are applied. The Indians see this legislation as dangerous to their best interests.

I wish to call your attention to several facts. In the first place, the Collier plan would not grant them any rights of self-government. The Indians have had self-government under the provisions of their treaties made with George Washington. In the second place, the New York Indians and some other tribes throughout the country have never been under full control of the Indian Bureau. Title to the lands has never been in any white's interests, either State or Federal. Their treaties were made while the Indians were still a free people and before all Indians were declared incompetent to handle their own affairs and made wards to the Federal Government. These treaties were made between the United States, a sovereign power, and the Six Nations, a sovereign power. It is because of these treaty rights that they have had self-government, free from Bureau control.

To accept this legislation is to place them under full control of the Indian Bureau. This bill gives to the Secretary of the Interior authority to control the affairs upon the reservation; provides that he shall grant self-government, if he sees fit, or shall withhold it; that he shall prescribe the form that government shall take; who shall be eligible to have a part in that government and hold lands; and all the rules and regulations under which it shall function. If he thinks the Indians are not living up to the rules and regulations which he sets forth, then he can recall all the powers of self-government, which have been granted, and either he, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or his subordinate, the Indian agent, shall resume full control.

It has been my experience that few Indians are interested in anything except to have Uncle Sam support and care for them. This is not the Indians' fault, but solely due to generation of fraternalism under our Indian Bureau.

The sweeping control granted in the Collier bill insures Indian fraternalism for generations to come; forces the Indian to be a separate race; deprives him of his rights under the full citizenship granted him in 1924 and revises the dangerous experiments, the life of a condemned bureau—an admitted failure after over 50 years of Indian care.

Duly delegated representatives from many tribes of the United States are bitterly opposed to the passage of this bill, which would mean anything but a new lease of life for the already condemned Indian Bureau system of Indian administration. The tribes from California, Oregon, Montana, North Carolina, and New York, together with Oklahoma, and tribes from other States, realize just what it means to be under full control of the Indian Bureau. These tribes of Indians, with the exception of the New York Indian, can do nothing without the consent of the Indian agent. He is the dictator of everything. They cannot hold a tribal counsel or a ceremonial dance without his consent. They cannot sell their stock or their produce without his consent—and then only to the people whom he designates. They cannot rent their lands except through him. They have to pay a grazing fee to him to graze cattle upon their own tribal property. They have to pay a fee of $2.50 to the Indian agency for permission to butcher a beef for their own use. All money which results from sale of produce or rental of lands is collected by the Indian agent, who deducts a fee before turning it over to the individual Indian. Moreover, he does not have to turn it over to them. He can keep it in his own hands and just issue orders to the Indians. He does not have to give an account to the Indians for this money, and when he does that they have to accept his figures, for they have no way of knowing how much their produce sells for or their land rents for. The Indians are, in reality, held in bondage—helpless slaves to the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

In 1834 this race of freedom-loving people, who had roamed this continent for centuries before the white race came, who had established forms of government, religious freedom, and a philosophy of life which taught them to live with nature, were declared incompetent and made wards to the Federal Government.

Soon thereafter the Bureau of Indian Affairs was established to educate the Indians and fit them to take their place with all other residents of this United States—a free people. It was to exist for 25 years. But it is still in existence, and, judging by the record of the congressional investigation, conditions among the Indians today are the most deplorable and pitiful to be found among any class of people in the United States.

They are helpless to help themselves because this Bureau has complete control not only of the property but also of the person of the Indian. And the Indians have no voice in Bureau government.

There is indeed great need for a new deal for the Indians. As expressed by the bills introduced into Congress, the proposed new deal is being hailed as providing freedom for the Indians. Sounds promising, but let us look at the bills.

They are heavy documents, covering 47 printed pages. They are divided into four titles and cover the legal status of practically the whole range of human activities.

Title I pertains to Indian self-government. Boiling down the technicalities, it means just this:

Upon a petition of one-fourth of the adult members of any Indian community, a charter is to be issued by the Secretary of the Interior giving these Indians the right to organize for self-government. Among other things, this charter shall provide the form that government shall assume, shall state who shall be eligible to participate, and shall specify, limit, and define the powers of self-government which the Secretary shall consider the Indians fit to have.

And if he does not consider them fit for self-government then he shall only set forth the conditions under which a charter will be issued.

Does this sound like freedom? Are the Indians given any choice in the matter? Of what avail is the provision that the charter must be ratified by a three-fourths majority of the Indians when the Secretary of the Interior is to be the sole judge as to the validity of the votes cast?

Or does it sound like further subjection of the Indians to the dictatorial power of one-man control?

Examining this part of the legislation further, we find that careful provision is made to retain all power and authority in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in the matter of transferring administrative powers to the Indians.

Further than this, at their discretion, the power to recall authority has been provided. Rules and regulations are the theme.

The present helpless condition of the Indians was caused by the ramification of rules and regulations of the Bureau made pursuant to the whims of former guardians. Rules and regulations and Bureau red tape have killed all initiative, curtailed every Indian industry, and reduced the Indian to the condition of serfdom which he occupies today.

And, as if that were not enough, the authority to delegate this power to subordinates is provided.

That means a continuation of Indian agents appointed by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to live upon the reservations, to supervise every act of the Indian lives, and to advise Washington officials that every Indian who complains is a worthless, shiftless, no-account agitator not to be believed under oath.

Freedom for the Indians! This part of the bills is but an empty gesture.

The Collier plan strikes at the very rights which have been maintained by the Indians because of our treaties. It is a subtle effort to trick the Indians into giving up those treaty rights and placing themselves under full control of the Indian Bureau. The legislation states that an election will be held upon the reservation to determine whether the Indians want it or not. But do not forget, all persons of one-fourth degree Indian blood who reside upon the reservations will vote in that election. And the bill further states that the Secretary of the Interior shall be the sole and final judge as to the validity of the votes cast.

I am informed that many promises are being made by the individuals working for this legislation upon the reservations. Among them is the age-old promise that settlements of their claims are to be made as soon as this legislation becomes the law. Once more that promise of big money is being held out as the bait to ensnare them. Do not forget that if it is paid when this legislation becomes the law, all persons of one-fourth degree Indian blood who reside upon the reservations will share in it. What will happen to those residing elsewhere is not stated.

I call these things to your attention because I believe that with the truth in your hands, you too will see the dangers of this legislation.

The following is an excerpt from a letter to my office under date of June 11, 1934, signed by Alice Lee Jemison ,secretary, Seneca Nation of Indians:

The California Indians are in a desperate situation. Could I please bring these men over to see you about 5:30 this p.m. and let you hear their story? It will be about their final chance. Their claim is against the State and the Department or Bureau which has appointed the attorney general of the State to represent them. The Indians wish to purchase a certain tract of land that is well equipped and adjoining their reservation and the Bureau will not do it and is going to buy land far away from their reservation and move the Indians onto it over their protest. Telegram received from out there this morning says that Collier has wired the local office that it is not necessary for the Indians to approve of how their money shall be spent, as he has full power and authority to do as he please.

Commissioner John Collier has failed. He promised to lead the Indians out of the morass of Bureau control under which they have suffered so grievously. But now, secure in his position of authority, he has proposed legislation in the so-called "Wheeler-Howard bill" which is more detrimental to Indian welfare, more autocratic in control, and more dangerous than anything which has gone before in the 100 years past that the first Americans have been held as prisoners of war—slaves to the Indian Bureau. * * *

Further than this, to secure the passage of this legislation he has made many misrepresentations. He has tried to deceive the President, Congress, the Indians, and the American public.

Speaking at a council meeting held at Muskogee, Okla., Commissioner Collier said that he did not seek the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Mission Indians of California still have the pleading letters which he wrote asking them to endorse him for Commissioner and to use their influence, particularly with Hon. WILLIAM MCADOO who was opposed to him, and letters thanking them for their support.

At that time he likewise stated in reply to a question that the Klamath Indians of Oregon had several years ago suggested many of the provisions of this bill. The Klamath Indians are opposed to the passage of this bill. The official tribal council has passed resolutions asking that John Collier be removed as Commissioner of Indian Affairs and that Wade Crawford, his appointee, be removed as their superintendent.

He has represented to everyone that the Indians are all supporting his measure. It has been printed into the hearings before the House committee that the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma endorse the bill. Hon. ELMER THOMAS, Senator from that State, is in possession of a memorial from the Five Civilized Tribes which states that they will be forced to stand upon their constitutional rights and ask that Mr. Collier be removed as Commissioner if he forces this legislation through Congress. The Five Civilized Tribes constitute the majority of the Indians in Oklahoma, which has the largest Indian population of any State.

There are present in Washington now, duly delegated representatives from many tribes of the United States who are bitterly opposed to the passage of this bill, which would mean nothing but a new lease of life for the already condemned Indian Bureau system of Indian administration. These tribes, from California, Oregon, Montana, North Carolina, and New York, together with Oklahoma and tribes from other States who have filed protests against this bill, represent more than half the Indian population in the United States.

This bill does not and will not do what it is supposed to do, provide for self-government among the Indians. It provides for increased power for the Indian Bureau, and nothing more.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert as a part of my remarks several letters and telegrams I received as well as copies of several other letters, which I offer as evidence showing that this bill does not and will not do what it is supposed to do, provide for self-government among the Indians. It provides for increased power for the Indian Bureau, and nothing more.

IRVING, N.Y., April 12, 1934.

Hon. ALFRED F. BEITER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On behalf of the interests of the Seneca Indians and all other New York State Indians, I wish to protest against our being included under section 2, title II, of the bill H.R. 7902, which is now before your committee.

1. It absolutely revokes the rights of free citizens which were granted to the Indians in 1924 by act of Congress.

2. It is too long and complicated; is full of new rules and regulations, and is subject to Bureau interpretation.

3. It is mass legislation, which is not applicable to all tribes.

4. It provides for a larger and more powerful Bureau by way of new appointments at increased cost to the taxpayers, and not only leaves all power where it has been for the past 100 years but also provides for increased and more detrimental power for the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

5. It provides only for continued segregation for the Indians, and provides no adequate protection for Indian property in accordance with established laws.

6. The idea of establishing a separate court for Indians only in this land of supposed equality is ridiculous, and it further provides for the appointment of Bureau attorneys to represent the Indians, which is an insult to all accepted standards of justice.

7. The whole bill provides nothing but increased and continued Bureau control and the opportunity for experimenting on the Indians with radical, communistic ideas.

I respectfully ask that this protest together with all other protests, both Indian and white, be filed in the record of the hearings before your committee.

The New York Indians, in company with all other Indians, would appreciate an opportunity to appear before your committee to express their opinions on this legislation. May I suggest that an open hearing date be set and announced well in advance so that we may so appear.

Thanking you for your consideration, I am,

Very truly yours,

RAY W. JIMERSON,
President, Seneca Nation of Indians.

MEMORIAL

MUSKOGEE, OKLA., March 12, 1934.

Hon. ALFRED F. BEITER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

The National Indian Confederacy, an organization of North American Indians, with the advancement of Indian welfare as its only purpose, has through its executive and legislative committees, thoroughly considered the Wheeler-Howard so-called "Indian rights" bill. Through the assistance of our attorneys and counselors, we have studied the bill itself and the propaganda published by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, including the ex parte hearings before the House Committee on Indian Affairs, held Thursday, February 22.

Our deliberations thus far have been in reference only to the proposed legislation as it affects members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma. It is to be regretted that some of our members, although we are bankers, merchants, attorneys, public officials, county, State, and national, and intensely interested in the welfare of the people affected by the bill, were not consulted before its introduction in the House and Senate.

We earnestly urge that no action be taken by the Congress on the bill until all Indians have had an opportunity to read and study the bill and express their views relative thereto. Our contacts with our fellow tribesmen is such that we are assured that at least 99 percent of the members of the Five Civilized Tribes are opposed to or will oppose this measure, once its provisions are thoroughly understood by them. No one here urges its passage except appointees of the Commissioner or candidates who hope to be and Government-war Indians, under the domination and control of Indian Bureau officials.

For the present our objections to the bill, in addition to its pernicious policy of foisting more extensive Federal paternalism upon us, is that—

1. For the organization of colonies, communities, or incorporated Indian societies the bill is unnecessary, as this can be done if any desire it, under existing law without interference from Washington.

2. A process of amalgamation, begun more than 200 years ago, has improved the condition of the Indian in spite of hardships and obstacles imposed upon us.

3. We are formally accepted as citizens of this State, with all the rights, privileges, and protection of other citizens and we are received socially without any regard to race antecedents.

4. Our children are received in the public schools, which has been the most important influence of the process of amalgamation.

5. Our property rights and personal interests are amply protected by courts whose judges and other officers are elected by a citizenship of which we are a part.

6. The vicious policy of separating our interests from those of our friends and neighbors can only precipitate a race prejudice which will imperil our social and economic status throughout the State.

7. We do not want—we will not voluntarily or cheerfully accept separate schools, separate communities, separate courts, or impeding obnoxious interference from Washington.

In consideration of the foregoing, we, the National Indian Confederacy, comprising Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminole Indians of Oklahoma, and representative groups of Cherokee, Shawnee, and Quepaw Indians of Oklahoma, respectfully ask that the Wheeler-Howard bill be not passed.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH BRUNER,
Principal Chief, Indian National Confederacy.

Attest:

W. K. LEFLORE,
Secretary, Indian National Confederacy.

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 9, 1934.

Hon. ALFRED F. BEITER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SIR: We, the undersigned, duly constituted delegates, representatives and headmen of our various tribes of Indians in the United States, do hereby protest against the passage of the so-called "Wheeler-Howard bill", H.R. 7902 or S. 3645, on the grounds that it violates the constitutional rights of the Indians to free speech, free press, and free assemblage.

It does not provide for the freedom of self-government. It is not necessary legislation, because the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs now have full power and authority to carry out most of the provisions of this bill.

Every tribe of Indians in the United States, practically, is in a deplorable condition today. This legislation, if enacted, would not remedy conditions which have been brought upon the Indians by 100 years of bureau control.

Do you wish 250,000 human beings continued in the bondage of slavery to a bureau in which they have no voice?

We leave the matter of this proposed bill to your own best judgment, confident that you will gladly heed the call for help from the Indians themselves.

Very respectfully yours,

Winslow J. Couro, Santa Ysabel Mission Indians, California; Delos K. Lonewolf, Kiowa, Comanche and Apache, Oklahoma; Levi Walker, Klamath Tribe, Oregon; Joshua Jones, chief of the Six Nation Confederacy, New York; Jesse Lyons, chief of Onondaga Nation of Indians, New York; Joseph Brooks, Siouan Council, North Carolina; Adam Castillo, president Mission Indian Federation, California; Alfred Minugh (individually), Gros Ventre, Mont.; Joseph Bruner, president, Indian National Confederacy, Oklahoma; Alice Lee Jemison, secretary to president, Seneca Nation, New York.

[Telegram]

JUNE 10, 1934.

Hon. ALFRED F. BEITER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The passage of Wheeler-Howard bill, as it was reported out of the House committee, would serve to abrogate the treaty rights of the New York State Indians which were established in 1784 when the Six Nation Confederacy made everlasting peace with the United States and were promised by George Washington that they would never be disturbed in their treaty rights.

We respectfully ask you to oppose this legislation when it comes before the House. Thanking you, we are,

Very sincerely yours,

JOSHUA JONES,
Chief of Six Nation Confederacy.
JESSE LYONS,
Chief of Onondaga Nation.
ALICE LEE JEMISON,
Secretary to Ray W. Jimerson,
President, Seneca Nation of Indians.

THE CRISIS—THE PRESIDENT—THE CONGRESS

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, one of the most serious problems confronting our Government at the time of President Roosevelt's inauguration was the unemployment situation. Approximately 14,000,000 people were jobless. The unemployment menace hung over our country like the darkness of night. We had more people unemployed in this country on March 4, 1933, than in all Europe combined.

American industry, agriculture, and commerce were idle and stagnant. The panic still held us in its grasp. We had an abundance of everything; but the consuming public, due to lack of employment, did not have any purchasing power.

Approximately 40,000,000 Americans were suffering from privation and want. These people had no income, hence no purchasing power. Misery was widespread in a time not of scarcity but of overabundance and plenty. Unprecedented unemployment, an untold fall in commodity prices, and unmeasured economic losses threatened our institutions.

The United States is, perhaps, the richest country in the world in resources. We were able to produce in the mills and factories far beyond our domestic needs and requirements. With all this surplus of wealth and resources, we had millions of willing, able-bodied men and women unable to secure work and, with no other source of income, sadly in need of food and clothing. These problems of unemployment and the distribution of our resources and wealth in a land where we had more of everything to eat and wear than we could possibly use, confronted with millions of human beings hungry and in distress, challenged the very foundation of our economic and political systems. The distress had cost us approximately $85,000,000 in national wealth. The loss of wages due to unemployment for the 2 years 1930 and 1931 was $21,600,000,000. It has been estimated that for every month in 1932 we lost $2,000,000,000. This loss, we knew, would continue until conditions improved.

We knew the unemployment situation would destroy the Nation unless our Government and industry could solve the problem. Immediate and constructive action was necessary. The loss of purchasing power of those unemployed had destroyed business and industry. The question was asked on every hand, "What can be done to remedy this situation?"

THE HOOVER ADMINISTRATION UTTERLY FAILED TO MEET THE CRISIS

I contended that the Seventy-second Congress, under the Hoover administration, should not adjourn without providing for immediate relief for those unfortunate American citizens who were then, through no fault of their own, enduring actual want, hunger, and starvation. This required immediate national aid, as public funds in many States, cities, and other subdivisions were exhausted. The jobless and hungry had to be fed and clothed; the cry of distress had to be answered by the Federal Government. The cure for unemployment is work. Private industry was unable to furnish employment. It was absolutely necessary that our Federal Government set in motion a program that would give people employment. Loans to States and cities had to be made. We issued billions in bonds to win the war. Certainly we could issue bonds for worthy works, such as the building of roads, bridges, the paving of streets, the elimination of grade crossings, the construction of public buildings, parks, sewers, waterworks, and other worthy projects. This program for which I spoke and worked in the Seventy-second Congress, was put into operation by the Roosevelt administration and the Seventy-third Congress. It is giving employment to our citizens and increasing the wealth of the Nation. Employment means increased prices in sales, increased manufactured products, increased prices for the farmer's products.

We must continue to reorganize our industrial system. We must, if necessary, control production. In this machine age improved methods have increased production. This must mean shorter hours for the laboring men in the governmental service and in private industry, with a fair and decent wage and a just share in the national income. This will mean a redistribution of the wealth of the country; but that should not alarm us, because too much of the wealth and industrial resources of the country have been concentrated in the hands of a few. This depression had to be overcome and it is being overcome by the Roosevelt administration.

DUTY TO DESTITUTE CITIZENS

In the meantime we must take care of our destitute and hungry citizens. We must continue with a wide-spread emergency program to meet the unemployment menace. We must continue a shorter workday and shorter hours for labor. We must continue with the present program of relief measures and legislation that will further dispel the darkness and roll away the remaining clouds overhanging our fair Republic, which we all love.

Much was said during the Seventy-second Congress concerning the responsibility of the Nation and States and local communities to provide relief and furnish work for the unemployed. It was admitted and acknowledged that the primary responsibility was local. However, innocent victims of panic and disaster do not make any hairsplitting decisions or distinctions between local and national responsibility. The people of the Nation pay the taxes. They are our defenders in time of peril. They did not expect the Nation for which they were willing to give their life and shed their blood in times of need, to desert or neglect them in their time of want and distress. Our country boasted its great progress. We boasted of mass production. We proudly gave to the world many inventions reducing and eliminating labor.

Our enthusiasm for the benefits derived from improved machinery caused us to become unmindful of the hardships of those who toil with human hands. We need not turn back. Society must progress; but it is the duty of society to find a solution or means of livelihood for those unfortunate members of its ranks who today find their labor by human hands displaced by improved machinery and are no longer needed. Society must provide a way for them to share in the profits or support themselves and their families in accordance with our standard of living and wages. This means the shortening of the workday and the inauguration of the 5-day week. This must be done in justice to all the people. Every laboring man and woman is entitled to his share according to his ability, needs, and opportunity.

Labor is not a commodity. As a reward for their toil, laboring men and women of the country are justly entitled to enjoy privileges and benefits which we as Americans believe are justly due all the people of our country.

Society must adjust itself to the changed conditions. If the so-called "big-business and capitalistic classes" of this country, who have reaped and are reaping enormous profits from their investments, do not make—and they have not made—a proper distribution of these profits in wages to labor, then it is the duty of our Government to exact in the form of taxes and redistribute to all the people a fair share in return for their toil and labor. It was a dangerous thing to have approximately 14,000,000 men and women unable to procure labor or support themselves in the land of plenty. Under the Hoover administration these patriotic people—idle, hungry, and in distress—were loyal, patient, and patriotic, hoping that a solution would be found for the ills that confronted them.

REDISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH NECESSARY

Changed and unusual conditions rightfully demand reversal of beliefs and opinions. That is the case today. There must be a redistribution of the wealth of this country so that the average man, the farmer, the laboring man and woman, the small merchant and business man, and those who depend upon toil for their living shall have a fair share of the returns. The future of the country depends upon the satisfaction of its people. The masses of the people who constitute the great backbone of this Republic must have an equal opportunity. We cannot and must not allow them to be trampled by the greedy and selfish interests, by the gigantic mergers and monopolies that would take all and give nothing. If these combinations, trusts, and illegal conspiracies and monopolies are not broken up, if the overage American citizen is not permitted to earn and enjoy his share of our natural resources, then I hesitate to say, I fear to predict what will happen to the country which we all love so much.

NEW THEORY OF GOVERNMENT

The rank and file of the American people, Democrats and Republicans alike, no longer believe in the old theory of government that "they should take who have the power, and they should keep who can." They no longer believe that property rights are superior to human rights. They no longer believe that a favored few should become enormously wealthy, while those who produce and create the wealth suffer in base poverty, misery, and want. But they rejoice that the old theory has been permanently replaced by a new philosophy of government under President Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Seventy-third Congress, in which human rights are considered higher and more sacred than property rights; in which every laboring man and woman is entitled to his share according to his ability, needs, and opportunity; in which every American is entitled to a fair and decent wage and a just share of the national income.

Every great crisis demands a great leader with a vision. Our Nation has safely weathered every storm because during every one of them a man of real leadership has come forth. History links the immortal name of Washington with freedom; Jackson with the rule of the people; the lamented Lincoln with the preservation of the Union; and the great leader who occupies the White House today with a greater, truer democracy in which the powers of the Government have been and will be exerted to serve mankind and guarantee security to the average men and women of our country. No longer will Wall Street and big business dictate the policies of our Government.

I believe the citizens of this great country of ours will cooperate with our President in his honest, constructive, and sincere efforts to bring back prosperity and plenty and to create conditions that will enable all our citizens to share more abundantly in the material and spiritual blessings of our country.

INTELLIGENCE IN GOVERNMENT

Men in private enterprise seek to find employees and executives of the highest ability. Each business requires men of special training and experience in particular fields. The Government of the United States legislates and administers for every type of business in the country. President Roosevelt has sought and secured men of the highest ability, training, and intelligence to assist him in the administration of his recovery program. There are some critics who attack President Roosevelt because he has brought intelligence to our Government. They would have us discharge every man who has specially trained himself for the post he now holds in the administration. However, it is only logical that the Government, as well as private industries, should seek men of the greatest intelligence and ability to assist it in its administration.

TWO PICTURES

We all know that 18 months ago we were in the midst of an economic depression, and a depression of mind and spirit as well. Banks were crashing on every hand. Farm and home mortgages were hourly being foreclosed. American industry, agriculture, and commerce were idle and stagnant. Human misery was widespread not in a time of scarcity but of overabundance and plenty. The farmers and merchants, laboring men and women, and the small business men were bankrupt and discouraged.

With the inauguration of President Roosevelt on March 4 came renewed hope and courage. From 1929 until his inauguration approximately 7,578 banks, with deposits amounting to approximately $6,000,000,000 had closed their doors. Under President Roosevelt's administration not a single bank failure has occurred, due to his wise banking reforms.

In 1921 only 21 people reported a $1,000,000 income. This number had increased in 1929 to 533 millionaires. The wealth of our country had been centralized in the hands of a few; 90 percent of the wealth was owned by 10 percent of the population. This centralization of wealth and the inequalities arising in the unfair distribution of the profits and benefits from industry, commerce, and agriculture had been going on for several years, encouraged by the stock-market orgy and the sale of worthless securities.

EMERGENCY LEGISLATION

President Roosevelt asked the Congress for powers that would permit him to meet the crisis and the emergency, for powers that would allow our Government to act quickly and decisively in bringing relief to our stricken and distressed people. He advocated no changes in our fundamental laws but preached the doctrine of equal rights for all and special privileges for none. He asked the Congress to enact such laws as would relieve human misery and suffering, protect the home owners in the enjoyment of their homes and the farmers in the enjoyment of their farms. He asked for legislation that would put men to work at an honest wage and guarantee to them the right of collective bargaining in self-defense. He asked for legislation that would curb merciless competition, unfair trade practices, wild speculation in stocks and bonds, and for legislation that would equalize the profits of agriculture and industry. He asked for legislation that would protect the average man and woman of this country from the unscrupulous hand of the powerful money changers and selfish interests of Wall Street and the bankers who had been running the show.

The Congress, responding to the wishes of the country and President Roosevelt, enacted into law such a legislative program. In so doing, they gave to the country the new deal, which means a square deal. In the past 18 months under the new deal, the hungry and distressed men, women, and little children of our country have been fed, homes and farms have been saved from foreclosure, the hard earnings, life savings, and bank deposits of our citizens have been guaranteed and safeguarded, with the reopening of the banks on a sound basis. Security has been thrown around investments. The rights of labor have been recognized as never before, and child labor and sweatshops outlawed and abolished. The farm problem has been given earnest and sincere consideration, and an honest effort has been made to equalize the rights and opportunities of all our people.

RENEWED FAITH OF OUR PEOPLE

The faith of the American people has been strengthened; confidence and hope restored, with the promise that, during the next 2 years of the Roosevelt administration, efforts will be made to secure proper housing for all our citizens, to guarantee security to American men and women by productive employment, and to give everyone protection against misfortune in old age. These great far-reaching policies are aimed to secure and realize a greater good for the greater number of persons. Social insurance to protect the masses against unemployment and insurance against misfortune and old age are parts of the President's future program. These promises of better homes, a better livelihood, and security, when viewed with the past performances of the administration, will appeal to the patriotic men and women of our fair Republic who earn their living by the sweat of their brow.

AGRICULTURE HAS BEEN HELPED

Permanent American prosperity depends upon the purchasing power of the American farmer. The destroyed purchasing power of this class of citizens was one of the most difficult problems faced by President Roosevelt and the Congress. The farmers have watched, through the years since the war, the bills, measures, recommendations, and proposals for farm relief, as they followed each other. As none of these proposals seemed to bring relief, the farmers despaired that a solution would ever be found. That the administration has worked sincerely and honestly to solve the problems of agriculture, no one can deny.

After months of sympathetic study and intensive research, the President recommended, and the Congress enacted, the Agriculture Adjustment Act. This act aims to increase farm purchasing power. Its main purpose is to adjust the difference in the price which the farmer receives for his produce and the price which is paid for that same produce by the consumer. It aims to give him the cost of production and a just profit. During the depression the value of the goods the farmer sells had fallen much farther than the cost of industrial products. In order to remedy this condition the Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to impose processing taxes on certain basic farm commodities, wheat, cotton, corn, rice, tobacco, milk products, and hogs; and later, sugar and cattle were included.

The immediate object of the Agriculture Adjustment Act was to bring the price of farm products up to the 1909–14 price level. The average yearly income of the American farmers from 1924 to 1928 amounted to $9,920,000,000. This income had fallen off to $3,979,000,000 for the period ending May 1, 1932. Under the operation of this act, the farmers' income was brought up to $5,535,000,000; an increase of over $1,500,000,000 in one year, which amounts to an increase of over 39 percent. Only 12 percent of this increase came from rentals and benefit payments.

The 1932 average price level for wheat was $0.39, corn $0.28, and hogs $0.035. The price, March 15, 1934, including benefit payments, was, wheat $0.859, corn $0.521, and hogs $0.0613, which would mean an increase to the wheat growers of approximately $172,000,000, to the corn growers $96,000,000, and to the hog growers $29,000,000. Three hundred thousand American farms saved through financing and the income of the American farmers increased over $1,500,000,000 is not a bad record for the first year's operation of the act. The same old crowd, the packers, the millers, the stockyards, and other selfish groups that have fattened at the expense of the farmer, are bitterly complaining.

President Roosevelt and the Congress have made honest efforts to raise the prices of farm products. Many details of this program are yet to be worked out; injustices have crept in and the full benefits expected have not as yet been fully realized. However, much has been accomplished. The New York Times' index shows that farm purchasing power has increased 25 percent over what it was a year ago. Practically every commodity which the farmer markets has increased greatly in value during the past year. With these advancements vividly before us, we have every reason to expect and believe, that if this program is carried forward and the American farmer continues to give his full cooperation it will finally result in renewed prosperity for every farmer and guarantee him a just and reasonable profit for his labor.

In addition to destroyed purchasing power another factor which threatened to destroy the farmer's only means of existence and wipe out his savings, was the appalling and ruthless foreclosure of farm mortgages. Farmers were burdened with a high rate of interest. Due to depreciated values it was necessary for the farmer to produce many times as much to pay off his mortgage as was necessary for him to produce when the debt was incurred. In other words, if a farmer had incurred a $3,000 debt when wheat was selling at $1 a bushel, he expected to repay the debt with 3,000 bushels of wheat. When the price of wheat fell to 35 cents a bushel, it took about 9,000 bushels of wheat to pay off the debt incurred with the expectation of raising 3,000 bushels. While the President was attempting to raise the price of farm products, it was necessary that he take some immediate steps to relieve the mortgage and debt situation of the farmers. An honest effort has been made to save the home of the farmer. By an Executive order, he consolidated all the agriculture credit organizations of the Government in order that they might make a united attack upon the credit problems of agriculture.

In this great drive against the difficulties facing agriculture, we shall not fail, because the American farmer will cooperate and cooperation is the principle upon which the program is based. With these major attacks on the problems which confronted our farmers, agriculture may soon be expected to assume its rightful place as the most important and prosperous American industry.

I have spent the greater part of my life upon the farm. At the present time, I own, live upon, and operate a farm. I know that conditions today are far from satisfactory in this great basic industry upon which all other industries depend. However, I have abiding hope and faith that the policies inaugurated by the Roosevelt administration for the relief of agriculture, will result in far greater benefits than the do-nothing policy of the Hoover administration, which was without a program and never made any honest attempt to equalize the wide difference existing in prices of those things which the farmer produced and those which he was compelled to buy. However, the policy of the Hoover administration and the wise ones who were running his Department of Agriculture, caused the farmers of the country to face an actual condition of serfdom, bankruptcy, and starvation.

Let those who criticize the recovery program of President Roosevelt and the Congress, let those who are trying to discredit the administration explain some of the things they did or failed to do; or let them offer a suitable satisfactory solution in place of the one that has been advanced by the farm leaders and farm organizations of the country and worked out by the President and the Congress.

THE NATIONAL RECOVERY ACT

The National Recovery Act principally affects industry and labor. Both are agreed that the principles upon which it rests are right and just. It has done and will do more to equalize the profits and benefits of industry than all other laws ever placed on the statute books. No one will contend that it is perfect. Hardships and injustices have no doubt resulted in many instances, but if you will go to the honest and legitimate business leaders and ask them what they think about N.R.A., they will tell you that it is here to stay. If you ask the laboring people if they want to get rid of it, they will tell you emphatically "No." They both agree that the objects to be attained by N.R.A. are fundamentally right and just. Honest business is anxious to get rid of the unjust and unfair competition and trade practices that have existed for the past several years in industry and commerce.

All will admit that it has put men back to work, shortened the hours of labor, raised the wage scale, improved working conditions, and permitted labor to share in the profits and benefits of industry. The elimination of unfair trade practices and savage competition which are ultimately paid for by labor, in reduced wages, are rapidly becoming a thing of the past. Under its provisions, child labor has been abolished and the sweatshop eliminated. The accomplishment of these humane and merciful provisions in the act, marks it as one of the outstanding laws of the century. It will go down in history as the first attempt to establish a code of honor for industry, and as labor's first bill of rights.

If properly enforced and obeyed, N.R.A. will ultimately eliminate the bad and preserve the good. Legislation of such far-reaching effect and consequence cannot be put in operation overnight. Injustices and hardships arising from unscrupulous business leaders will eventually be corrected.

It has helped to place men back to work, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and place renewed faith, confidence, and hope in the hearts of the distressed men and women of our country. The N.R.A. has been a success; labor, capital, and industry all admit that it has improved the employment situation and has aided business. Unemployment under this act was reduced from 13,203,000 to 7,903,000 during the first year of its operation. A total of 5,296,000 men and women were placed back to work. This is truly a wonderful and excellent record. Under its provisions the volume of business of the country has shown a general increase. Commercial failures have decreased, proving that business under the N.R.A. is rapidly getting upon a sounder basis. The cost of living has not gone up out of proportion to the general rise in wages and commodity prices.

This great piece of humanitarian legislation is here to stay, because the principles upon which it is founded are just and equitable. The good it has done is not denied by anyone. Injustices and hardships are certain to be corrected by our President, who is a great statesman, a man of vision, and a courageous leader.

CONCLUSION

I have reviewed but briefly the accomplishments of this administration and this Congress. Time will not permit me to outline every constructive measure enacted, nor will it permit me to give every method by which we have in this Congress, under the direction of President Roosevelt, attacked the problems of depression. However, from the accomplishments which have been outlined, it will be readily seen that every law passed by this Congress was passed to right some specific wrong which had sprung up under former administrations.

I submit this record of the President and the Congress, candidly and proudly, to the people of our country and the good people of the district whom I have the honor to represent. The American citizens will decide upon the merits of the accomplishments of this administration and they will decide whether or not we shall have an American Congress pledged to the continued support of President Roosevelt.

HON. ROSS A. COLLINS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD copies of four brief but important communications. I do this with the consent of the Member of the House to whom these communications are addressed, Hon. Ross A. COLLINS.

The epoch-making services which Mr. COLLINS has rendered to the cause of education and scholarship are recognized throughout the Nation. Through his indefatigable labors the most priceless collection of rare books in existence was purchased by the Government and is now in the Library of Congress. I refer to the 3,000 books known as the "Volbehr Collection", including one of the only three copies in the world of the original Gutenberg Bibles.

Everyone knows the story of the terrible plight of the public schools during the depression. Through the efforts of Mr. COLLINS, Federal funds were provided which kept hundreds of schools open and thousands of children in school during the present school year. This achievement received Nation-wide recognition of the kind that is expressed in the following communications:

The first communication is from the National Educational Association of the United States, with headquarters at Washington, D.C. It is as follows:

To ROSS A. COLLINS:

Permit us to express the appreciation of 200,000 teachers of America for your valiant work in the improvement of the library service at Washington and for your leadership in the movement to keep the schools of the Nation open during the depression. The teaching profession, the friends of education, and the children in the rural and other schools throughout the Nation are under deep obligation to you for the telling blows you are striking at the present time. No Congressman has a better batting average than yourself. Kindly accept our heart-felt appreciation.

Dated at Washington, D.C., May 15, 1934.

JESSIE GRAY, President.
J. W. CRABTREE, Secretary.

The second communication is from the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, whose headquarters are at Washington, D.C. It reads as follows:

FEBRUARY 15, 1934.

Hon. ROSS A. COLLINS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. COLLINS: I cannot express adequately my appreciation of the service you have rendered the cause of education throughout the Nation during the present session of Congress.

Your success in securing adequate appropriations for printing for the United States Office of Education will make possible the dissemination of information of the utmost value to parents and teachers in meeting the educational problems which confront them as a result of the economic depression.

That every child in the United States in communities of 5,000 population or less may be in school for the balance of this school year is a consequence of your efforts no one familiar with the facts will question.

With cordial best wishes, and sincere gratitude for these valuable services for the children of our Nation, I am

Very sincerely yours,

MARY T. BANNERMAN,
(Mrs. WILLIAM T. BANNERMAN,)
National Chairman Committee on Legislation.

The third communication consists of the following telegram from the State superintendent of education of Mississippi.

JACKSON, MISS.,
March 31, 1934.

Hon. ROSS COLLINS,
Washington, D.C.:

You deserve everlasting gratitude of all people in Mississippi interested in school for their children. Without your efforts hundreds of our schools would have closed before regular term was out. May you live long and prosper.

W. F. BOND,
State Superintendent of Education.

The fourth communication consists of a testimonial from the Teachers' Union of the Nation's Capital. This testimonial reads as follows:

To ROSS COLLINS:

Devoted and loyal public servant for his continuous, active, helpful interest in our public schools the Teachers' Union of Washington, D.C., expresses its deep appreciation.

DISASTROUS RAINS AND HAILSTORMS IN THE SOUTH—SURVEY NOW BEING MADE

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the House, for the past 3 weeks we have had in the South continued and excessive rains, and in several sections hailstorms. Crops have been washed away and destroyed in many instances. Grass and boll weevils are raging.

I have secured the services of a representative of the National Red Cross to make a survey of these conditions. I received a telephone report from the Red Cross this morning bearing out my statement as to conditions. The Red Cross and the relief agencies of these States will take care of emergency cases.

Thousands of farmers, if they are to make a crop and pay to the Government money already borrowed through the seed-loan office and the Production Credit Corporation, must have at once additional funds to buy nitrate of soda in order to successfully produce their crops. What are we going to do about it?

I have already asked for a conference with the Secretary of Agriculture, hoping to secure additional loans for farmers whose cotton is now pledged to the Government under the 10-cent-per-pound program. The parity price on cotton today is about 15 cents. Commodity Credit Corporation will make these loans if instructed to do so by the Secretary of Agriculture.

There are thousands of farmers who do not have any cotton pledged who have either borrowed through the seed-loan office or the Production Credit Corporation. I have taken this matter up with Mr. Garwood, Farm Credit Administration, and find that he is willing to reopen seed loans if the facts as stated by me warrant same.

Farmers of the South are not asking for a dole, but they are asking these credit activities to supply their needs in that they have not any other place to go to get these funds.

Gentlemen, this is a serious situation, and I want to call on Members representing those States where we have had these rains and hailstorms to join with me in putting over this program. Please get in touch with your county agents, get the facts, and call on Mr. Wallace, Mr. Garwood, the National Red Cross, and Mr. Hopkins.

TELEGRAMS FROM SOUTH CAROLINA

CAMERON, S.C.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.:

Note your effort Sunday State to have additional advance made on Government-loaned cotton in warehouse. We urge continued efforts for advance of additional 5 cents per pound. Necessary since rains continue for 4 weeks. Oat crop seriously damaged; feed short; other crops deteriorating daily, especially cotton. Need additional loans to clean crops of grass, buy feed, and pay for extra labor.

BARNWELL, S.C.

Congressman H. P. FULMER:

I quote below copy of telegram dispatched to Malcolm Miller and also sent to Hopkins today:

"On account of floods which have reached the proportion of cloudbursts, which have fallen continuously for 2 weeks and still continue to fall, Barnwell County is inundated, and has and is suffering the greatest loss in its history. Cucumber, cantaloup, and watermelon crops destroyed. From these farmers usually receive sufficient funds to feed their laborers and themselves through to cotton. All oats which have been cut and stacked are a total loss, leaving no summer feedstuff for stock. Corn crop destroyed and will probably not yield 40 percent of average crop. Cotton crop under water, washed up, and destroyed—half crop hardly possible. Many of our county roads and bridges are impassable, and it will tax the resources of the county to restore partial road system. Mill dams and causeways that have stood for 50 years are washed out. Our people feel hopeless. We are really in greater distress than we were when the relief agency was established during Christmas week 1932. On behalf of our distressed citizens we appeal for immediate special aid of $200,000 or more. Your office here will report details. Advise if we may have conference with you and your local administrator from here at some hour tomorrow."

Situation really very distressing. Do what you can immediately for your people.

EDGAR A. BROWN.

ORANGEBURG, S.C.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
Member of Congress:

On account 3 weeks' destructive rains and some hail, great damage done crops in Willow, Liberty, Limestone, Union, and Zion Townships. Damage inestimable to crops and land. Wheat and oats virtually complete loss, terraces demolished, fields badly gullied. Funds for immediate relief for farmers distressingly needed. Unless extensive relief for rehabilitation is obtained, human suffering will result. Please contact relief authorities for help and Department of Agriculture for inspection. Appreciate immediate action and reply.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to insert therein a radio speech delivered by our distinguished colleague [Mr. CONNERY].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Congressman WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., of Massachusetts, over station WOL, of Washington, D.C., June 7, 1934, on the subject of Social Insurance.

Ladies and gentlemen, the problem of social insurance has commanded the attention of the American public for a great many years, and it has been only in recent years that any marked degree of progress has been evident in this particular field.

During the period of prosperity, unemployment was not such a serious menace, as work was more abundant, and wages were higher. We were riding on the crest of a wave, so to speak, and in the midst of this period of progress and prosperity there were no prevalent circumstances to warrant an interest in social insurance, except by thinkers who have foresight and see the necessity of planning ahead.

The history of the old-age-pension movement dates back over a number of years, and there have been many worth-while and laudable efforts made to secure the enactment of this type of legislation, not only in the several States of the Nation, but also by a Federal old-age-pension statute. Conditions in industry and other vocations in years past were not so strained and taxed as they are now, and tenure of employment was more or less certain. It was not unsual for an individual to be employed even at the advanced age of 60 or 65 years, but as the problem of unemployment became more serious, there developed a tendency to supplant the older worker with the young man and the young women. Certain industries and establishments adopted policies of not employing persons beyond a given age, and this age was generally set at 45 years, and in some instances, the age limit of employment was as low as 40 years.

It is not difficult to ascertain just what sort of a situation this created. Many of the persons thus deprived of means of earning a livelihood for themselves and their families were left to cast about as best they could in search of work; and bear in mind, fully 90 percent of this group were persons with family responsibilities. The Government itself maintained an age limit of employment, and it became increasingly difficult for a person of recognized middle age to secure a job. As the unemployment wave gained momentum, the manifest hardship occasioned by discrimination in employment gave rise to a new and added activity in the interest of social legislation. Several States, seeing the absolute necessity of promoting legislation to care adequately for the aged, adopted old-age-pension laws. In most cases the age requirement was fixed at 70 years, and it was specified in the law that the applicant's property holdings should not exceed a certain figure, generally $2,500. Some States further provided that no person would be eligible for relief whose relatives were able to provide support. The average rate of benefit paid under the old-age-pension statutes now in force in the 28 States which have passed this legislation is $30 per month.

The present record of old-age-pension legislation shows that 28 States have enacted these laws since 1924. Efforts were made during this period from 1924 to the present time to secure the enactment of a Federal old age pension law, and although the interest in and the public support of this legislation has developed materially, it has not yet been possible to get such a measure through Congress.

It would not be far amiss, however, to say that public demand for this legislation has grown so strong that it is more than probable that a Federal bill will be enacted during the next Congress.

As the unemployment situation became more and more tense, and there was seemingly not offered any proposal which would either stem its tide, or abate the stranglehold which it had fastened on the American people, it became obvious that other legislation would be necessary to bridge the gap between employment and unemployment. At one time during the late days of 1932 and early 1933 it was estimated that there were some fourteen millions of people out of work, and while this astounding and alarming figure was constantly mounting, modes of relief were not keeping pace with this rapid increase. Business conditions in general were claimed to be the cause of the unemployment, but the underlying and contributory factors attendant to the wildfire spread of dismissals were, in great part, due to the machine replacing the man. With progress in every conceivable line of industry, the machine has constantly and steadily played havoc in the ranks of labor. Speed in production and quantity output have been the first concerns of business, and as a result of this emphasized machine production, hundreds and thousands of employees have been thrown out of work or reduced to part-time employment. A very simple illustration may be cited of the effect of machine development and its consequences if we consider the case of the ordinary steamshovel used for excavating purposes.

This appliance now performs in the usual workday the same amount of work which was formerly done by a hundred men, and this is characteristically true of all labor-saving devices which have been introduced in our manufacturing, farming, and other pursuits. From the basic thought that the machine has displaced untold numbers of workers, it is not a serious task to determine how some of the unemployment has resulted. One remedy, of course, is to shorten the hours of labor; reduce to 6 hours the workday and to 5 days the work week; but that is only one step; the next step is to create through some agency a balance between conditions of employment and unemployment. The American people cannot be expected to live forever under private or public charity, and they cannot be expected to endure forever the conditions of privation and misery which have beset them during the last 3 or 4 years. The only real and sensible method or manner in which we can meet this challenge to the maintenance of decent standards of living and conditions among the people is to provide some type of social insurance which will guarantee our citizens against the sufferings and hardships of periods of depression such as we are experiencing now. I firmly believe that it is incumbent upon the States and the Federal Government to see to it that American citizens are adequately and properly cared for during the crises in employment over which they have no control and for which they are in no manner responsible. The general scheme would be that every employee who has been working regularly for a given period of time should receive benefits during any enforced lay-off which he might suffer. In this manner we can easily do away with the prolonged stretches of depression as it affects the people.

Unemployment-insurance bills have been introduced in Congress to do this very thing. The real and important factor is that American citizens shall not live in want. The saddest and most pathetic aspect of any employment crisis is the effect it has on the young generation—lack of confidence or loss of confidence in government, increase in crime, destruction of health and morals, and a general undermining of American ideals and institutions.

The history of the progress of labor is an old one and a painful one. It would be futile in a discourse of 15 minutes to try to go back through the centuries and trace the gradual rise of man from slavery and peonage to what we know today as liberty and freedom of action under the Constitution of the United States. When the barons forced King John to sign the Magna Carta at Runnymede with the battle cry of "Give us back the laws of the good King Edward", they were but taking up the sword again in the seemingly never-ceasing conflict between those who seek only power and money and citizens of any country who love liberty and freedom. We are facing today the same old crisis, in these relations between capital and labor, which were fought out during every century in the past, since men were changed from slaves into freemen. It is a strange quirk of human nature that many employers of labor apparently would prefer to see their firms or their corporations lose millions of dollars in a strike rather than pay one-fifth of that amount to the worker for decent living wages, thereby avoiding strikes.

Their cry seems to be all down through the ages, "I am to be the master, you are to be the man; I will give you what I think you ought to get in wages and hours, and not what you think you ought to get, or even what the general run of mankind thinks you should get in wages and hours; and unless you acknowledge my power, I will fight you with all the weapons that money can buy, whether it be in the press, on the radio, or through other propaganda; and I will take advantage of every interpretation of the law to shoot you down and starve you and your family under the plea that I am protecting my property and that property rights come before human rights."

Such a state of mind in financiers can never, of course, result in peace between capital and labor. Neither I nor any other person who has a knowledge of conditions in our country would state that labor, organized or unorganized, has no faults or makes no mistakes, and that all of its leaders, great or small, are 100-percent honest and simon pure in every respect. That would be saying too much for human nature.

But a careful analysis and study of the great struggles of labor and capital in this country since the beginning of the Republic will show that, with the exception always proving the rule, in 99 out of every 100 cases labor has always been fighting for a decent living wage and the right to breathe freely as American citizens and not merely exist under the domination of wealth as exemplified in our big trusts and corporations. Labor has seldom received its just deserts.

Today in the fierce antagonism by the big moneyed interests to the Wagner-Connery bill, which legislation is a sincere endeavor to bring about adjustment of labor disputes and prevent serious labor disturbances, we find that old story of master and man: "I will not deal with you because you belong to a labor union; I will form my own company unions; I will dominate the leadership of those company unions, control them by special favors such as paying them for spreading propaganda during working hours while pretending to find out what the workers want; and then, through these company unions, I will have absolute security and protection when I refuse any demands that free and independent workers in my employ may make. Incidentally my company union will aid other company unions in other concerns, thereby building up an army of company unions to smash organizations such as the American Federation of Labor and the railroad unions, which I have tried unsuccessfully to control." That apparently is the attitude which is taken by big business today. With the knowledge which I have gained during my 12 years in Congress as a member of the Committee on Labor, and for 4 years as chairman of that committee, I feel it my duty in talking to you tonight to say frankly that I believe that the great industrial leaders of the United States are fooling with dynamite in resisting all attempts of their workers to obtain shorter hours and decent pay, and to obtain their inherent right to bargain and negotiate collectively for that pay and for those hours.

Just a little application of the Golden Rule would help a great deal at this time. If these great employers of labor could place themselves, if only for an hour or two, in the position of the man working before the blast furnace, in intolerable heat; or of the telephone operator, sitting for hours in a nerve-racking occupation, endeavoring to satisfy all of the whims of a sometimes erratic public; or of the miner, working deep down in the bowels of the earth, shut off from all light and sunshine; or of the workers in all occupations requiring mental and physical strain—if these employers could put themselves in the positions of these workers, and forget for a time the almighty dollar and the love of power and glory, we might then see a different attitude on their part, and we would see an era of good will, prosperity, and happiness such as we have never seen before, not only among the workers but among the employers as well. Some sayings are used so often that they become trite, but when we reach the time that the great holders of wealth realize that it is more blessed to give than to receive, we will see harmony between capital and labor. Until then I fear we will see nothing but the trouble, chaos, violence, and bloodshed which we have seen during the strikes of the past few weeks.

I am still hopeful that we have some men in control of industry today who are big enough, sane enough, and patriotic enough to have a love for their fellow man, and that these men will brush aside those in their midst who through greed would crush anyone who stands in the path of their quest for gold—even women and helpless little children—and will make plain to these exploiters of the weak that honest industry has no place for them. We have recently lived through an experience in the United States which has taxed to capacity all of the imagination, thoughts, and resources of the American people, and we have not yet provided all of the necessary means to insure a just protection to our citizens, a protection which every citizen rightfully deserves. If we hope to relieve wholly and effectually the conditions which have cramped enterprise, cut wages, and caused suffering to the people, and further, if we hope to prevent, at least in some measure, a recurrence of this blight in our future civilization, we must immediately proceed with the enactment of not only old-age pensions, shorter work-week legislation, and the labor disputes bill, but also unemployment insurance. This, and only this, is the means through which we can establish a balance between employment and unemployment. No one would attempt or wish to stifle inventions. The machine age will continue with us and we will continue to have unemployment unless we plan ahead, and it is principally against this unemployment that we must prepare ourselves for the security and well-being of our future generations. Man must be master of the machine, not the machine master of the man.

ANNUAL DINNER OF THE AMERICAN ACCEPTANCE COUNCIL

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein two speeches delivered by the Hon. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, before the bankers' convention.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, at the annual dinner of the American Acceptance Council, New York City, Monday, January 29, 1934:

Members of the American Acceptance Council, you are indeed kind to invite me to your dinner. During the 15 years of your existence you have rendered a splendid service to the banking interests of our country. You were organized for "the purpose of conducting and directing a Nation-wide educational campaign designed to inform the business people and bankers as to the merits of bankers and trade acceptances, the method of their use in foreign and domestic merchandising, also to aid in establishing a comprehensive open discount market, and to assist in other matters that will improve the credit system and strengthen the financial position of America."

The success of your efforts is at once apparent in glancing at the volume of acceptances. The average in 1930, according to your secretary, was $1,492,000,000, and even in the trying year of 1933, the volume did not fall below $688,000,000. Any plan which can finance American business to the extent of four and a half billion dollars in one of the most crucial periods of financial history should challenge the attention of every careful student of finance.

Few people have the proper conception of what has been done and can be accomplished through acceptances. Permit me to quote from the Acceptance Bulletin of July–August 1933:

"Many people have the mistaken idea that the credit of a bank is expressed only by the cash which it lends to its borrowers. It is not generally appreciated that in addition to the cash which a bank may lend on the promissory notes of its customers it has an additional source of potential credit equal to 100 percent of its capital and surplus. At the present time there is over $700,000,000 of such bank credit in circulation, and at one time, in late 1929, the total reached $1,700,000,000. This accommodation to strong commercial interests of the Nation is all backed by the credit and good name of the commercial banks and bankers. Acceptance credits are provided, against which bankers' acceptances are drawn and none of the banks' cash is used."

These bankers' acceptances have been recognized by the Federal Reserve Act and by the Federal Reserve Board. The rules with reference to their eligibility for rediscount are clear and unmistakable.

The financial history of 1933 has been written; the book is closed. Students of government and finance for generations to come will read that story with interest and profit. The March crash brought to an end a regime which could no longer sustain itself. Edmund Burke, one of the most distinguished statesmen and orators of the English Parliament, commenting in one of his speeches on the revolutions, riots, and unrest in different parts of the British colonies and other countries of the world, sighed and said, "Thank God, the past is at least secure."

Let me bring to you tonight a brief picture of the work of the Comptroller's office during the past year. If the title of an office has any relation to its activities, the name Comptroller of the Currency is a misnomer. Heretofore, the most important duties of the office have been the chartering and supervision of national banks. When an application for a charter is presented, a careful study is made of local conditions with reference to the community to be served, the necessity for new or additional banking facilities, and the prospect of success, which in turn involves the management of the institution. This responsibility should not be lightly exercised. When a national bank is chartered, an implied invitation is extended to the people to deposit their money.

Since the establishment of the banking system in 1863 the Comptroller has had exclusive jurisdiction over national-bank receiverships. On March 4, 1933, there were 1,067 such receiverships, and since that date 420 national banks have been placed in receivership. I might here explain that the figures I am giving you tonight include not only all the national banks in the country, but 10 banks in the District of Columbia which are directly under the jurisdiction of my Department. Under the terms of the Banking Act of 1933, individual receivers will not be appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency. The Banking Act requires that the Comptroller shall appoint the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as the receiver for all national banks which are class A stockholders in the permanent deposit fund and which should fail. This is a wise provision because of the large interest the insurance corporation will have in the banks.

Under the Emergency Banking Act of March 1933, 1,446 banks were unlicensed after the banking holiday, and subsequent thereto most of them were placed in conservatorship. The placing of banks in conservatorship was a departure from the old procedure. The theory was to permit the officers and stockholders to reorganize the institution. This placed a tremendous burden upon the Comptroller's office, and an entirely new division, known as the "Reorganization Division", was established. Experienced examiners were called in from the field and men trained in banking law were put to work on the gigantic task of formulating plans which would reopen these banks. Committees representing depositors and stockholders came to Washington to discuss their plans of reopening. No record was kept of the conferences with these committees prior to the week ending June 26, 1933, but from that time through the week ending January 26, 1934, 3,686 committees were interviewed by my Department. The examiner's report of each bank's assets and liabilities was carefully analyzed. It was impossible to find two cases that were exactly similar, as the character of assets, the financial responsibility of stockholders, and the financial history of the community were all factors to be taken into consideration.

The depositor has always received the first consideration. It has been our aim to build a solid banking structure in this Nation. We have encouraged consolidations and mergers and have used what has been commonly called "the Spokane plan" in a large number of instances. Let me illustrate what I mean. In the city of Washington, D.C., we prepared a plan whereby a new national bank called "the Hamilton National Bank" was organized, and it purchased the prime assets of seven banks which had been placed in conservatorship in that city. The new bank made available to depositors in the closed banks 50 percent of their deposits, or approximately eight and a half million dollars. The remaining assets, largely frozen, of the seven banks have been placed in the hands of two receivers instead of seven. The wisdom of this policy is at once apparent. The depositors will receive additional dividends from the receivers as fast as collections justify.

Deposits in the 1,446 unlicensed banks after the banking holiday aggregated $2,009,137,780. This figure is based on reports of the conservators of the 1,105 conservatorship banks, and on the December 1932 call report for the remaining 341 unlicensed banks. You will be interested to know that by December 31, 1933, every one of these 1,446 unlicensed national banks had been carefully examined and plans considered and either approved or disapproved. At the close of business on January 25, 1934, 1,070 of these 1,446 national banks were licensed, chartered, absorbed, or placed in receivership. On this same date, 376 national banks remained unlicensed, and of this number 298 had plans approved for reopening. The amount of frozen deposits in the 376 banks unlicensed on January 25, 1934, was $334,312,000. This figure was based on the October 25, 1933, call. In other words, only 16.7 percent of the $2,009,137,780 now remains frozen in unlicensed national banks. It is interesting to note that if we eliminate the banks which have approved plans and consider only the banks with disapproved plans, there is but $55,889,000 remaining as frozen deposits, which represent merely 2.7 percent of the $2,009,137,780. Let me say, however, that many of the banks with disapproved plans may still present a plan which will meet with the approval of the Comptroller's Office.

In laying this record of accomplishment before you, I cannot too highly commend the men and women connected with the Comptroller's Department who gave their best effort and worked without counting the hours late into the night, holidays, and Sundays, without a single complaint, because they were imbued with the idea of the service they were rendering to the people of the Nation. Indeed, surrounded by such unselfish devotion, one could not help being thrilled at the sacrifices so willingly made. When a great ocean liner gracefully and smoothly glides into port with its thousands of passengers, the captain first leaves the ship and then the passengers hurry down to meet their impatient friends or relatives. Whenever I have the privilege of witnessing such a sight, I try to look through the sides of the vessel into the boiler rooms where half-dressed men stand before the terrific heat of the engines, and I wonder if just some little credit should not be given to these men. They may not hear the cheers or the tribute because they have sought relief from fatigue in well-earned sleep, but this should not justify withholding our commendation.

The President on October 23, 1933, appointed a committee for the purpose of strengthening the capital structure in banks. Harvey C. Couch, a director of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, was named chairman of the committee, and the other members were: Jesse H. Jones, chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; Eugene R. Black, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board; Dean G. Acheson, then Under Secretary of the Treasury: Lewis W. Douglas, Director of the Budget; J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency; Walter J. Cummings, Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; Henry Bruere, president of the Bowery Savings Bank in New York; and Frank C. Walker, executive secretary of the executive council.

This committee has met several times a week since its appointment, and principally on its recommendation the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has authorized the purchase of preferred stock, notes, and debentures, and loans on preferred stock in the amount of $710,050,850 up to and including January 24, 1934. Of this sum, $193,671,467 has actually been purchased in preferred stock of national banks by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation up to January 24, while the local communities have purchased $37,070,433 in such stock.

The President appointed a liquidating committee on October 15, 1933. C. B. Merriam, a director of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, was made chairman of this committee. The committee consisted of Jesse H. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; Dean G. Acheson, then Under Secretary of the Treasury; J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency; Walter J. Cummings, Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation; and Lewis W. Douglas, Director of the Budget.

Few people appreciate the relief given to the depositors through the efforts of this committee. Experienced men were selected in different sections to appraise the assets of closed banks, and loans were made against these assets for the purpose of immediate distribution of dividends to depositors. These men served without compensation and rendered a valuable service. Up to and including January 25, 1934, $302,457,739 has been approved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for distribution, and $146,600,882 of this amount has been already advanced and disbursed to depositors.

Contrast this with the old system. When a bank was placed in receivership the receiver could not borrow. The receiver made his collections, sometimes creating hardships upon people through foreclosures, sometimes destroying a business, and at the end of a year or two a dividend was paid. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, representing the Government, now holds these assets and makes collections in an orderly manner, withholding property and securities from the market if the price is not favorable. But the depositor has received a substantial portion of his deposits. The day following the organization of this committee, my department presented for its consideration an application for a loan on the assets of the Commercial National Bank of Washington, D.C., which loan was approved in the sum of $1,714,000, which enabled the receiver of this institution to distribute an additional 30 percent to the depositors, making a total distribution up to that time of $2,741,082, or 50 percent.

Too much cannot be said in commendation of the work of Mr. Harvey Couch and Mr. C. B. Merriam as chairmen of these committees. In all of these financial problems, Hon. Jesse H. Jones, chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has been a tower of strength. He is broad-gaged, and he is gifted with a vision which can instantly interpret the problem of every community.

Probably the most important and far-reaching changes with reference to banking were contained in those provisions of the Banking Act of 1933 with reference to insurance of deposits. In one form or another, banks have guaranteed deposits for many years. Nearly every State, municipality, and political subdivision, as well as the National Government, have required banks to pledge their best bonds or have required surety bonds to protect their deposits. The amount indemnified by surety bonds is not available, but on June 30, 1933, national banks had pledged to protect Federal deposits $659,885,000. Banks which received postal funds had pledged securities in excess of the amount deposited by the Government. As of December 30, 1933, it was estimated that there was on deposit in the Postal Savings Banks the amount of $1,209,425,417. The passage of the Postal Savings Act was largely due to President William Howard Taft in June 1910, who recommended it to Congress. In March 1933 the administration was confronted with a demand on the part of the people to either take the limit off postal savings accounts and not restrict deposits to $2,500 or to insure the deposits in the commercial banks of the country. When we contemplate that postal savings had increased over a 4-year period from June 30, 1929, to June 30, 1933, in the amount of $1,033,538,844, or more than 672 percent, we realize the seriousness of the problem.

The President appointed Mr. Walter J. Cummings of Chicago and Mr. E. G. Bennett of Ogden, Utah, as members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The Comptroller of the Currency was named a member ex officio in the bill. Upon the organization of the Board, Mr. Cummings was elected chairman. I cannot summarize the work of this Board more concisely than the chairman did in his report to the President. Mr. Cummings said:

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Pursuant to your request, I have the honor to submit to you a brief report of the work of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

"We have insured 13,423 banks. The insurance covers deposits up to $2,500 until July 1, 1934, when the permanent provisions of the act becomes operative.

"A careful survey shows that 97 percent of the total number of depositors are insured in full.

"We found 141 banks ineligible for insurance. A number of them may be insured by making certain corrections. In other words, approximately 1 percent of the applying banks could not qualify. This remarkable record was due to the assistance given by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by the purchase from banks of preferred stock and capital notes.

"I believe that the insuring of bank deposits will not only be of incalculable value in restoring public confidence in the Nation's financial institutions now strengthened, but that it will be of tremendous assistance in hastening the return of prosperity.

"It will banish the fear of the depositor as to the safety of his money, and from the banker's point of view the elimination of the possibility of sudden and heavy withdrawals will make possible the expansion of credit for legitimate purposes.

"The Federal Government has subscribed $150,000,000 to the capital of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Reserve banks have subscribed $140,000,000, and in assessments the corporation has received over $37,000,000, making a total of $327,000,000 available funds for the immediate use of the corporation.

"I should like to express my real appreciation of the untiring efforts and close cooperation shown by the other two directors of the corporation, Mr. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, and Mr. E. G. Bennett.

"The immediate task you entrusted upon your directors has been accomplished. We now direct our efforts to the advance of a great work—protect deposits and permit banks to function as useful instruments in the recovery program.

"Thanking you for the opportunity to serve in this way, I am,

"Very sincerely yours,

"WALTER J. CUMMINGS, Chairman."

The President replied to this letter as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. CUMMINGS: I congratulate you and Mr. Bennett and Mr. O'Connor because you have in these few months accomplished with complete success a gigantic task which the pessimists said could not possibly be done before January 1.

"That 97 percent of the bank depositors of the Nation are insured will give renewed faith.

"I am also happy to know of the fine cooperation given to you by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

"Very sincerely yours,

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

There are approximately 54,000,000 individual deposit accounts each insured to the extent of $2,500 in these institutions. When the bank bill was under consideration in the Senate a resolution was passed requesting the Comptroller to secure from national banks of the country certain information with reference to depositors and their accounts. This was the first time that such information was ever accumulated. A telegraphic request was sent to each national bank, and 4,836 banks responded giving information from which the following statistics were compiled: There were 21,748,754 accounts with balances not exceeding $2,500, and the average deposit in these accounts was $183.17; the average deposit for accounts of $2,500 and not exceeding $5,000 was $3,318.93; the average deposit for accounts of over $5,000 and not exceeding $10,000 was $6,803.92; the average deposit for accounts of over $10,000 and not exceeding $50,000 was $19,714.82; and an average deposit was $211,820.85 for all accounts over $50,000. The average deposit in all reporting banks was $663.32.

Every bank which applied for insurance was carefully examined and many of them reexamined by one of the largest and most efficient examining forces ever assembled in this country. Banks which were found not sufficiently strong to join the fund were assisted in two ways. First, the stockholders made large contributions to the capital structure and, secondly, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation cooperated magnificently in supplying additional capital where needed.

It is my opinion that the banking structure of the Nation was never on a more firm foundation than it is today.

The criticism of banking practices has not come exclusively from outside the profession, but many leading bankers have pointed out in no uncertain terms weaknesses and imperfections in the system. The late Francis H. Sisson, past president of the American Bankers Association, in his address in Chicago, said:

"It was the greatest disintegration of economic conditions and values in history."

And again he said:

"The catastrophe was unquestionably due in chief part to that disintegration of values and business conditions that began in 1929. But it was due also to a serious condition of weakness that had become inherent in the banking structure itself, largely through causes beyond the control of sound banking."

"Even during the era of booming prosperity", admitted President Sisson, "bank failures averaged 650 institutions in a year."

Mr. Guy Emerson, vice president of the Bankers Trust Co. of New York, writing in the New York Herald Tribune on January 2, under the title "A Black Page in American Banking History", said:

"With the object of securing safety of deposits there can be no quarrel. Bank depositors are fully entitled to this protection. The last 13 years constitute a black page in American banking history. It seems almost incredible that the country should have allowed its banking system with obvious weaknesses to drift along in this epidemic of failures until the confidence of the people was almost completely destroyed and the whole system collapsed. It would be unthinkable to allow these losses to continue in the future."

I agree with President Sisson when he said:

"The past year has unquestionably been one of the most critical periods in the history of American banking. We are suspicious nowadays of 'new eras', but it is probably no exaggeration to say that the crisis of March 1933 marked the end of an era in our banking history and the beginning of another."

In a carefully prepared brief on deposit insurance Mr. W. J. Price, one of the staff of attorneys for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, quotes extensively from Huebner in Yale Readings in Insurance, placing the total amount of risk carried at Lloyd's at approximately two and one-half billion dollars, while the total premiums were not more than 20,000,000, or 1 percent of the risks assumed. It occurs to me that this is a very important figure, when we consider the extensive operations of Lloyd's and the variety of risks insured. Insurance policies are written—"against fire, epidemics, sickness, and all sorts of accidents; against the risks of journeys and business ventures; against the loss of works of art and valuable possessions, or to avoid loss from the unforeseen stoppage of games and races, or to meet contemplated changes in the foreign tariffs, or to provide against the risks of war during periods of political excitement, and a hundred and one other contingencies of every conceivable kind, many of them nothing more than betting arrangements. Combining all these different forms of indemnity with the marine business, authorities place the total amount of risk carried at Lloyd's at approximately $2,500,000,000, while the total deposits paid in by members as a guaranty for the performance of contracts are placed at not more than $20,000,000, or about 1 percent of the risks assumed"— Says Huebner.

Certainly, many of the risks assumed are more hazardous and less susceptible of accurate determination than losses by banks. Many banks have closed not because they were insolvent but because the depositors demanded their money, and the bank, unable to convert all of its assets into cash, found it necessary to close its doors. We have many instances where banks have "failed", as the word is generally used, and yet have paid 100 cents on the dollar to depositors and even returned some money to the stockholders. The full significance of this statement is appreciated when we consider that the receiver was able to do this and was prohibited from doing any new business in the bank to pay the overhead.

The risks involved by bank insurance of deposits is entirely different from practically any other form of insurance. When an individual whose life is insured dies, the loss is 100 percent; when a house burns to the ground, the loss is 100 percent. We have definite figures showing the losses in national banks since the beginning of the system. For example, it is found that the average percentage of recovery upon claims proven to depositors of the 1,155 closed national banks which had been liquidated and the affairs thereof finally closed from the year 1865, the date of the first national bank failure, to October 31, 1933, was approximately 66.76 percent, while the percentage of recovery based upon all classes of liabilities of such group of banks was still more, or approximately 76.79 percent.

Mr. Price adds to the Lloyd's list the following specific risks under policies written by American companies; and this is not meant to be inclusive: Sprinkler leakage insurance, rain, hail, earthquake, explosion, riot, plate glass, steam boiler, credit, title, and fidelity.

There is no group of business men in this Nation who are stronger advocates of all forms of insurance than bankers. We have no more conservative group of men in the country. You will recall the resolution passed by the American Bankers Association at their convention in Chicago on September 7, 1933, which convention I had the pleasure of attending. It was as follows:

"The American Bankers Association hereby records its deliberate judgment that the dangers involved in attempting to initiate at the beginning of 1934 the provisions for deposit insurance contained in the Banking Act of 1933 are genuine and serious."

I am sure that the men who voted for this resolution are as happy as we are that their fears were unfounded. The Banking Act of 1933 has on the whole met with the approval of the people and of the more liberal and constructive leaders in the banking world.

Prohibiting the payment of interest on demand deposits has not only corrected an unsound practice of banking but will eliminate the payment of many millions of dollars. The total amount paid during the past 5 years by member banks on demand deposits was $1,230,242,000, making an average per annum of $246,048,500. While the Federal Reserve Board has the power to fix the rates of interest for member banks, it had no jurisdiction over nonmember banks, which seriously interfered with the proper exercise of this power. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has passed a resolution fixing the rate of interest at the same rate as that set by the Federal Reserve Board and eliminating interest on demand deposits. Thus the State nonmember banks and the member banks of the Federal Reserve are placed on the same basis.

In administering the provisions of the Banking Act of 1933, my department has found that a number of the sections should be clarified and my annual report to Congress, which is now in the hands of the Printer, recommends 12 changes and 3 additional amendments to the act. Time will not permit a discussion of these changes at this time, but the report will shortly be available.

One of the fairly accurate barometers of business is found in a summary of the call reports of national banks. The summary for the last call which was made on December 31, 1933, will not be available for some little time. However, the figures are available for the June 30 and October 25, 1933, calls. Probably, the first figures the average person glances at are the deposits and the loans. The deposits on June 30 were $16,774,115,000, and on October 25 were $17,055,208,000, showing an increase of $281,093,000. During the same period loans and discounts increased from $8,116,972,000 to $8,257,937,000, which was an increase of $140,965,000 more than on June 30. The aggregate assets of the national banks in continental United States, Alaska, and Hawaii amounted to $21,198,649,000, or an increase of $338,158,000 over the total of June 30.

An interesting comparison is made between the condition of the banks on September 30, 1932, under the call as compared with October 25, 1933. On the latter date there were 1,028 less national banks and yet the difference is not great. Let me give you the figures:

	Oct. 25, 1933	Sept. 30, 1932
Number of banks	5,057	6,085
Aggregate assets	$21,198,649,000	$22,565,995,000
Loans and discounts	$ 8,257,937,000	$ 9,919,662,000
Deposit liabilities	$17,055,208,000	$17,681,917,000

An additional fact which gives added assurance to the sound condition of the finances of the Nation was contained in the announcement made by the Secretary of the Treasury last Friday when he announced that the Treasury offering of $500,000,000 in 2½-percent Treasury certificates was oversubscribed nearly seven times, and the offering of $500,000,000 in 1½-percent Treasury certificates of indebtedness was oversubscribed more than two and a half times. This clearly indicates that the Treasury of the United States has the enthusiastic support of the Nation in its fiscal policies. The oversubscription indicates that a five-billion issue or more of similar securities would have been as readily absorbed by the country. This oversubscription is evidence of the great faith the people have in the leadership of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and an unequivocal approval of the Chief Executive's choice of the new Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Morgenthau approaches his problems with great deliberation. He has a mind which quickly analyzes a situation, and the ability to carry through a conclusion once determined. It is a pleasure to be associated with him in the work of the Treasury.

Burke consoled himself with the fact that the past was secure. With the cooperation of all the bankers with the insurance board, deposits will be secure. It is difficult to justify the leadership of the past to men and women whose savings have been wiped out—men and women who had by denial, self-sacrifice, and hard work saved enough to spend the twilight of their lives in happy contemplation and who suddenly found themselves objects of charity. They did not ask for pension, nor for public contribution. They had the right to expect their Government to provide a safe place for their savings. It has been done. It was not a partisan measure. Every Member of the Senate voted "aye" and only six Members of the House voted against the measure.

One dishonest man burns his house; the honest man helps to pay the loss. One dishonest man steals or embezzles; the honest man helps to pay the loss. One careless automobile driver kills a pedestrian; the careful drivers help to pay the damage. One man feigns illness and perpetrates a fraud; the healthy man pays the compensation. One dishonest banker steals; the honest banker and the Federal Government pay the loss within the limits prescribed by law.

Deposit insurance will unite the rural banker and the city banker as never before in a common purpose. The needs of the one will be better understood by the other, to their mutual advantage and to the safety of their customers. Bankers of America, the challenge is at your door. The opportunity is yours. To fail means disaster; to succeed means happiness in every home, happiness which comes from a sense of security. To refuse the challenge would make you unworthy of your heritage and would be a betrayal of a great trust. Let us go forward together.

I thank you.

WEST TEXAS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the West Texas Chamber of Commerce embraces an area of about 100 counties in central western Texas, and at its sixteenth annual convention, held at San Angelo, Tex., it passed by unanimous vote on May 15, 1934, a very short resolution respecting the preservation to west Texas the watershed of the Colorado River. I ask unanimous consent at this point to put it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. The resolution was introduced by Hon. Charles E. Coombes, a former president of the West Texas Chamber of Commerce, and as passed unanimously by the convention is as follows:

Resolution 29

The West Texas Chamber of Commerce reaffirms the position it has maintained for many years with reference to water rights on the Colorado River and other streams. Efforts have been made in recent sessions of the legislature to change or modify a law passed by the forty-second legislature fixing priorities in the allocation and appropriation of waters, and there is now pending an application for a grant from the Federal Government, which if granted would nullify efforts to safeguard the public interest.

It is resolved that the West Texas Chamber of Commerce, in accordance with its policy of long standing in the controversy over the allocation and priorities of the waters of the Colorado River, stands unalterably opposed to any attempts to modify the basic policy through passage of laws and the pending application and calls on the Federal Emergency Relief Administration to deny the application on the ground that its real purpose is to pass the control of water rights to the hands of private corporate interests and deprive the people of the enjoyment of the preference and priority now declared by law to be theirs.

LAURA GOLDWATER—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report upon the bill H.R. 4253, for the relief of Laura Goldwater, for printing under the rule.

A. W. HOLLAND—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report upon the bill (S. 551) for the relief of A. W. Holland for printing under the rule.

GEORGE E. Q. JOHNSON

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 4460) to provide for the payment of compensation to George E. Q. Johnson, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out all after "is" down to and including "act", in line 10, and insert "hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $5,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary for payment of the claim."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

COMMEMORATION OF SETTLEMENT OF LA SALLE COUNTY, ILL.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, in the spring of 1834 a small band of immigrants from Norway, under the leadership of Cleng Peerson, settled in La Salle County, Ill., on the site of the present village called "Norway." On June 22, 23, and 24 of this year that historic event will be commemorated with appropriate ceremonies at Ottawa, Ill. I believe it fitting that the one hundredth anniversary of this significant event should be brought to the attention of this body.

The population of Norway is approximately 2,800,000. There are today in the United States more than 1,100,000 persons of Norwegian birth and blood. The number of persons of Norwegian birth and blood in the United States is larger in proportion to the population of the mother country than that of any other racial group in the United States, excepting the Irish. I doubt that any other racial group, numbers considered, has had effects as beneficial to the development of the Middle West and the far West as have the Norwegian-Americans.

Shortly after the settlement in La Salle County, these immigrants erected a log church building. That was significant of the history to be made by the Norwegian-Americans wherever they were to settle. They always built churches and schoolhouses. As soon as their meager means would allow them, they erected colleges, and a number of the finest small colleges in our country have been founded and financed by Norwegian-Americans. Among them is Luther College at Decorah, Iowa. Throughout Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, the Dakotas, and, in later days, in the far West, Norwegian settlements were founded. In every case these settlements were characterized by industry, good citizenship, and good morals. The Norwegian people have been essentially and almost universally good citizens. In peace time they have contributed to our country's prosperity and in war time they have supported our country patriotically and loyally.

The descendants of the Norwegian pioneers have achieved success in agriculture, in business, in finance, in the professions, and in public life. But more than all these achievements is the great contribution that they have made to our country in the sound citizenship, in peace and in war times, that they have fostered and developed.

On June 22, 23, and 24 Americans of Norwegian blood will gather at Ottawa from all parts of our country. The Governor of Illinois, Hon. Henry Horner, will pay his tribute to these pioneer settlers of his State. Distinguished Americans of Norwegian blood will be there. Hon. John J. Sonsteby, chief justice of the municipal court of Chicago; Dr. Orlando Ingvoldstad; Rev. H. A. Hansen; Einar Josephsen; Dr. L. M. Larsen, of the University of Illinois; Rev. L. W. Boe, and others will take part in the program. The Norwegian people have always loved music and cultivated musical talent among themselves. So at the celebration in Ottawa the famous choir of St. Olaf's College in Northfield, under the direction of its noted leader, F. Melius Christiansen, will give a concert.

On this occasion a huge boulder to commemorate the pioneer settlement will be dedicated. It will memorialize the sound and enduring qualities of our citizens of Norwegian blood who have contributed very much to the strength of the American Republic.

NECESSITY FOR ESTABLISHING NIGHT AIR-MAIL SERVICE OVER DIRECT ROUTE BETWEEN DENVER AND KANSAS CITY

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a letter to the Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter to the Postmaster General pointing out the urgent necessity of establishing night air-mail service over the direct route between Denver, Colo., and Kansas City, Mo. This letter bears 28 signatures, including those of all the Senators, and all but two of the representatives from Colorado, Kansas, and Missouri.

MAY 29, 1934.

Hon. JAMES A. FARLEY,
Postmaster General, Post Office Department,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. FARLEY: Establishment of night air-mail service over the direct route of 560 miles between Denver and Kansas City is essential to serve adequately the commercial needs of these two cities, which are the largest and most important between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast.

Moreover, this direct route would furnish much needed overnight air-mail service for the intervening towns in Kansas and Colorado which are now without any air-mail service whatsoever and each of which is the center of an important agricultural area. It would also afford air-mail facilities not now available to Colorado Springs, Pueblo, and Trinidad to the south of Denver, each of which has important commercial relations with Kansas City and the East.

In order to attain speed and reliability—the purposes of the air mail—it is requisite to business men that an air-mail letter delivered in the Denver post office at the close of business hours shall, in due course, reach the addressee in Kansas City on the first delivery the next morning. Under the present arrangement, perhaps an air-mail letter which is posted in the Denver post office in the middle of the afternoon will be delivered in Kansas City the next afternoon. Such air-mail service between the two most important cities between the Pacific coast and the Missouri River is worthless to business men. It is cheaper and as expeditious to send letters by regular mail carried by train.

At present, all air mail between Denver and Kansas City is carried by a stub air line 100 miles north to Cheyenne, thence flown by plane on the main transcontinental route to Omaha, thence on another stub line 165 miles south to Kansas City. This detour of 265 miles makes the trip half again as long as the direct route. As a result of the delays incident to this detour and the uncertainties of connections, an air-mail letter delivered to the post office in Denver at the close of business hours will be delivered in Kansas City little if any sooner than one addressed to a business house in New York City.

The direct route could be flown from Denver to Kansas City in 4 hours. Letters deposited in the post office at Denver at 6 o'clock in the evening would arrive at Kansas City about 10:30 p.m. and at St. Louis somewhat later in the night, and at Atlantic seaboard cities in the morning. It would afford overnight service from Denver to Kansas City, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Washington, or New York. The same advantage would accrue to letters originating in the east going to the west.

Air-mail letters must now be completed early in the afternoon and delivered to the Denver post office a few minutes after 3 o'clock—long before the close of a regular business day. Under the present arrangement, a letter mailed in New York does not reach Denver or central Kansas until the second morning.

Denver, including in its metropolitan area 325,000 people, is the business and financial center for the entire Rocky Mountain region. It is the largest manufacturing city between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast. Its marketing area has an estimated population of 6,000,000 people. There is no other city even approaching it in size between Kansas City and the west coast. In Denver are administrative headquarters for the beet-sugar, mining, coal, sheep, and cattle industries. Denver is the Federal administrative center for the entire West, with over 60 bureaus and commissions of the United States Government—the largest number of governmental bureaus and administrative offices in any city outside of Washington, D.C. It has the largest banks, both commercial and investment, between Kansas City and the Pacific coast, the largest stockyards and meat-packing plants, commercial houses, wholesale distributing and jobbing establishments, and the most important branch of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City.

Kansas City, in its metropolitan region, including Kansas City, Kans., has a combined population of over 550,000. It is the business and financial headquarters of the region toward the southwest and also directly west through the middle of Kansas. It has air-mail service southwest to Wichita and Oklahoma, but no air-mail service westward through Kansas.

These two cities—the largest and most important between the Mississippi River and the Pacific Ocean—under the present arrangement are without adequate or commercially usable communication by air mail.

Furthermore, the State of Kansas, with a population of 1,900,000, is wholly without air-mail service except in the extreme southeastern portion.

The Governors of Kansas and Colorado joined in a petition for the establishment of this direct air-mail route to be flown at night. The General Assembly of Colorado adopted a joint resolution urging it. Business and commercial organizations in Denver, in Kansas City, and in numerous towns and cities in Colorado and Kansas have again and again pointed out the urgent need for it. Scores of citizens and business interests have petitioned Senators and Representatives in Congress, and have urged that the Post Office Department establish this direct service which so vitally affects the commercial intercourse between over 3,000,000 people.

In answer to these numerous petitions the Post Office Department has referred to the fact that until February of this year there was air-mail service by day on the direct route between Denver and Kansas City, and that the amount of mail carried on this route did not exceed 30 pounds per day, and that part of this was diverted from the main transcontinental route. The reason more letters were not sent over this route is, of course, obvious. To be of any commercial advantage, air-mail service must be arranged so that a letter mailed in one city at the close of business hours can be delivered at the opening of business the next morning, so that orders may be filled and business transacted before the close of that day, and a reply, posted that night, be received early in the next morning. If night air-mail service over this direct route is established between Denver and Kansas City it is safe to say that the amount of air mail originating in these two cities, and in the territory intervening, would increase rapidly and soon exceed in volume that carried over routes of similar length in other parts of the West.

As is stated in a letter to one of the undersigned by the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City:

"The present plan of air-mail routes leaves us absolutely without satisfactory service to the West. Replies from various representatives of the Post Office Department to our protests are that suitable service has been arranged through Omaha to Cheyenne to Denver. The fact that an air-mail letter delivered to the post office at Denver will reach New York before one addressed to Kansas City will arrive here ought to be sufficient answer to that representation by our postal officials. Train service is much more adequate in both directions over this essential Kansas City trade territory."

From time to time, in response to insistent petitions by officials, commercial organizations, and citizens of Colorado, Kansas, and western Missouri, the Post Office Department has also said that the air mail could not be flown by night between Denver and Kansas City because the route is not provided with adequate landing fields. This objection is no longer justified. Kansas City and Denver each has an air field unsurpassed anywhere. There are municipal airports at Topeka, Salina, Hays, and Goodland, Kans., and within the last year emergency landing fields have been provided at Lawrence, Wakeeney, and Oakley in Kansas, and at Burlington, Limon, and Deertrail in Colorado.

It has also been urged by the Post Office Department that this direct route could not be flown by night because it is not lighted and is not provided with radio range stations. The Department of Commerce has indicated that the route has not been provided with these facilities because the Post Office Department has not asked that such facilities should be provided. If request is made by the Post Office Department, it is believed by the undersigned that the Department of Commerce will provide these facilities.

It is earnestly insisted that, in order to provide for intercommunication by air between Kansas City and Denver, the two largest and commercially most important cities in the region between the Mississippi River and the Pacific coast, and in order to serve the commercial needs not only of these two cities but also of the intervening territory, representing over 3,000,000 people, air-mail service by night should be established over the direct route between Denver and Kansas City.

Very truly yours,

Geo. McGill, United States Senator from Kansas; Edward P. Costigan, United States Senator from Colorado; Bennett Champ Clark, United States Senator from Missouri; Roscoe C. Patterson, United States Senator from Missouri; Alva B. Adams, J. L. Milligan, of Missouri; Clyde Williams, Member of Congress from Missouri; Arthur Capper, United States Senator from Kansas; Edward T. Taylor, Member of Congress, Fourth District of Colorado; C. C. Dickinson, Member of Congress, Sixth District of Missouri; Clifford R. Hope, Member of Congress, Seventh Kansas District; W. P. Lambertson, Member of Congress, First District of Kansas; U. S. Guyer, Member of Congress, Second Kansas; Clarence Cannon, Member of Congress, Ninth Missouri; Lawrence Lewis, Representative, First District of Colorado; Kathryn O'Loughlin McCarthy, Member of Congress, Sixth District of Kansas; John J. Cochran, of Missouri; Fred Cummings, Member of Congress, Second Colorado; W. A. Ayres, Member of Congress, Kansas Fifth District; J. B. Shannon, Member of Congress, Kansas City, Mo.; M. A. Romjue, Member of Congress, First Missouri District; John A. Martin, Member of Congress, Third District of Colorado; J. R. Claiborne, at large, Missouri; R. M. Duncan, Member of Congress, St. Joseph, Mo.; James E. Ruffin, Member of Congress, Missouri at large; Randolph Carpenter, Member of Congress, Fourth District of Kansas; Ralph F. Lozier, Second Missouri, Member of Congress; R. T. Wood, Sixth Missouri, Member of Congress.

ONE YEAR UNDER ROOSEVELT

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, a little over 1 year ago one of the gloomiest spots in the world was none other than "the land of the free and the home of the brave." We were in the throes of not only an economic depression but a depression of mind and spirit as well. Banks were crashing on every hand, industrial failures were coming thick and fast, farm and home mortgages were hourly being foreclosed, the bankruptcy courts were being overworked; business men, uneasy, nervous, care-worn, were working night and day in an effort to hold on; millions were milling around in a state of dejection, eager and willing to work but unable to find employment; hunger, the monster that overthrows judgment and reason, was abroad in the land, and the faith of our people had reached a dangerously low ebb.

CAUSE LEADING UP TO MARCH 4, 1933

Economically, financially, and spiritually this country, in my opinion, on March 4, 1933, when Mr. Roosevelt took command, had reached its lowest level. We did not reach this low level over night. Back of our decline was a reason of long standing. And that reason, in my opinion, was the centralization of wealth and the inequality in the distribution of the profits and benefits arising out of industry and agriculture that had been going on for years. I know there were other contributing causes such as the stock-market orgy, the sale of worthless securities, and our money and credit structure. The real governmental malady, however, was as I have stated, and the real problem the redistribution of wealth and the equalization of the profits and benefits of industry and agriculture.

I am not preaching socialism, or anything akin to socialism, when I tell you that this Nation can no more carry on half rich and half beggars than it could have carried on half free and half slaves. And I am not against the profit system when I tell you that the system will die of its own transgressions unless it recognizes the fact that the sower as well as the reaper is entitled to a fair division of the profits.

Far better for us to face the facts in a courageous way now than to wait and have them brought to our attention later by men dethroned of reason by hunger and want.

Let us briefly review the facts: God has blessed us in a peculiar way. We have the greatest country, inhabited by the greatest people, on earth. America is more nearly self-sustaining than any other country on the globe. If we were isolated from the rest of the world we would suffer very few, if any, inconveniences. Our country is capable of not only sustaining our people, but sustaining them in comfort. We have a plenty not only of the necessities, but the luxuries of life, to go around and then leave a surplus. One of our problems of late has been to get rid of our surpluses.

And yet on March 4, 1932, with our granaries bursting, millions of our people were hungry; with our factories capable of producing, and plenty of raw material on hand, more clothing than we needed, millions of our people were poorly clad; and with our people able and willing to work, millions of our people were out of employment. And I am only preaching Americanism when I tell you it is a shame—a burning shame—for people to go hungry and naked in a land of plenty. And I do not have to argue with you to convince you that something was out of gear, and badly out of gear, when such a condition prevailed.

The fundamental cause leading up to this sad debacle was that the people were without purchasing power, caused chiefly by wealth becoming centralized and an equal division of the profits and benefits of industry and agriculture being denied the laboring people and farmers. The buying elements in our population are the laboring people and farmers, and when we cut off their purchasing power we paralyze our whole economic structure.

To show you the direction in which we were traveling, let me remind you of the fact that when I was a boy—and that has not been so very long ago—a millionaire was more or less a curiosity. We would travel as far to see a millionaire as we would to see a circus. How about today? Why, a man with a beggarly million today fails to register in the class of wealth. Until recently a million-dollar income or a million-dollar salary was unheard of. As late as 1921 only 21 people reported a million-dollar income. This number had increased in 1929 to 533. And salaries were becoming so ridiculously high that the American Tobacco Co. was paying its president a salary of $2,500,000 per year, which is more money than the 8,000 growers of dark air-cured tobacco, producing around forty to fifty million pounds, received for their entire tobacco crop in 1932. It is now estimated that 90 percent of the wealth of this country is owned by 10 percent of our population and less than 1 percent of our population receive two-thirds of all dividends paid.

Well, common sense should teach us that centralization of wealth has gone too far and that we should now, before it is too late, begin to set in motion machinery that will redistribute the wealth of this Nation back to the people. I do not mean by this that wealth should be divided up as preached by those entertaining socialistic views, nor do I mean that I would treat anyone unjustly, but I do mean that through an inheritance tax and an estate tax we should begin to redistribute the wealth of this country in a sane and sensible way, and in such a way as not to penalize thrift and industry. I am not preaching that a man with the opportunities afforded in this country cannot honestly accumulate great wealth, but I am preaching that if he does, that one of his legatees when he dies should be the Government that afforded him the opportunity.

Sane and sensible income, inheritance, and estate tax laws is the only way wealth can be redistributed and, after it is distribtued, is the only way to prevent its recentralization. Moreover, such laws will go a long way toward producing the revenues necessary to run this Government and will place the tax burden where it rightfully belongs—that is, upon those best able to pay.

Now, as to the equalization of the profits and benefits of industry and agriculture.

First, let us consider agriculture.

Measured by the price the consumer pays for foodstuff, clothing, and tobacco, there is ample profit in cattle, sheep, hogs, wheat, corn, tobacco, and cotton. The trouble has been that the profit is not equally distributed between the producers and those who process and handle the commodity before it reaches the consumer. To illustrate, let me take tobacco, as I have had occasion to go into the tobacco problem pretty thoroughly of late.

At the price the consumer pays for tobacco there is plenty of money in tobacco for the growers, the warehousemen, and manufacturers. The trouble is the profit is not rightly distributed. The tobacco growers most of the time work at a loss in order for the manufacturers to make swinish profits.

Take a package of cigarettes made out of 15-cent tobacco and here is the way the profits are divided:

	Cents
Grower receives for the tobacco in a package of cigarettes at 15 cents per pound	0.9
Factory cost, including making the cigarettes and packing in cartons	.7
Selling costs	.7
Federal tax on package of cigarettes	6.0
Total	7.9
Profit at 15 cents per package	7.1
Profit at two packages for 25 cents	4.6

Now, if the grower was paid 30 cents instead of 15 cents for his tobacco, which would only be a fair price, it would add less than 1 cent to the cost of a package of cigarettes, and this additional cost could be absorbed by the manufacturer without, in any way, crippling him, or reducing his profit below the point where his industry would not be a profitable one. And this additional price to the tobacco grower would change him from an economic liability to an economic asset—from a citizen pursuing an unprofitable business to one running a profitable business and able to purchase the goods, wares, and merchandise produced by others.

In order to further impress upon you the inequality in the distribution of the profits and benefits of agriculture let me give you, for comparison, the amount received by the tobacco growers of America for that part of their crop sold to the four large tobacco companies, which is about two-thirds of the entire crop, during the past 3 years, the amount of net profits made by the four companies on said tobacco and the dividends paid by them during the same period:

Year	Amount received by the tobacco growers for their tobacco sold to the four large companies	Net profits made by the four large tobacco companies	Dividends paid by the four large tobacco companies
1930	$136,000,000	$108,850,000	$79,510,000
1931	96,100,000	114,040,000	79,750,000
1932	69,000,000	110,340,000	79,650,000

What do you think of the four large tobacco companies making in one year more in net profits than the 400,000 tobacco growers received for their crop? And yet that is just what happened in the years 1931 and 1932. And in 1932 the four large tobacco companies actually paid out in dividends more than the tobacco growers received for their tobacco.

Now, I do not have time to analyze other farm products, such as cattle, sheep, hogs, corn, cotton, but if you will go into these farm commodities you will find that practically the same thing has been going on, namely, the farmer has not been sharing in the profits and benefits of the farm product he raises.

Now, let us look into industry.

Measured by the price the consumer pays for the things produced by industry, labor in this country should be a profitable employment. The trouble is that labor, except in a very few instances, has been unable to share, in the form of wages, in the profits of industry. We have been zealous in our effort to enact laws to promote industry and make it possible for industry to pay huge dividends not only on invested capital but watered capital as well, and to cut huge "melons" at frequent intervals, but we have done very little to enable labor to share in the dividends or partake of the "melons."

I realize that industry is entitled to a fair return on invested capital—not watered capital—and that it should be encouraged in every fair and legitimate way. I am a friend of legitimate industry and want to see it prosper. But on the other hand, I believe labor is entitled to a fair return on the sweat of its brow, and that while it should not prosper at the expense of industry, it should certainly receive its just and fair proportion, in the form of wages, in the profits and benefits of industry.

The trouble heretofore has been—and we should be ashamed of the record—labor has not received its fair and just proportion of the benefits and profits of industry.

Let me illustrate by giving just one example: Mr. Carnegie was in the steel business about 25 years and retired with a fortune of $230,000,000, which shows that he accumulated at the rate of $10,000,000 per year. If the men who worked for Mr. Carnegie had received their just and fair proportion, in the form of wages, of the profits of the steel business conducted by him, it would not have been possible for him to have amassed such a fortune; and instead of one man being blessed with more money than he knew what to do with, thousands would have accumulated a competency.

Now a fair and just wage will change a laboring man from an economic liability to an economic asset—from a citizen unable to sustain himself and family to one who becomes a good purchaser of the goods, wares, and merchandise produced by others.

The case of Mr. Carnegie is not an isolated case, and I have used it as an illustration simply because I happened to be in possession of the facts. You will find that it is, more or less, a representative case of what has been going on in all large enterprises. And the result has been the pauperizing of labor to the point of destroying its purchasing power.

I have said before, and I repeat it, in my opinion, a low wage scale is one of the greatest curses a country can be afflicted with.

Now, I have given you what, in my opinion, led up to the sad estate in which we found ourselves on March 4, 1932, when Mr. Roosevelt took command.

And, lest we forget—and the American people forget entirely too soon—let me remind you of the legitimate offsprings of these causes that Mr. Roosevelt on March 4, 1933, found crying to high heaven for relief:

Between twelve and fifteen million people, upon whom countless millions depended for bread and meat, were out of employment. Hunger, as never before in the history of this country, was abroad in the land, and millions had been shivering through the winter that was coming to a close.

The spirit of many of our people had been crushed, their faith shattered, and their hope lost. Every morning the papers carried a new list of those who, unable to longer carry on, had ended it all by self-destruction.

In 4 years 7,578 banks had closed, involving $5,914,287,000 in deposits, and the banks left open knew that they, at best, could only carry on for a few more days.

Thirty-one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two industrial failures, involving $928,313,000, had taken place during the past year, and new ones were being added daily to the list.

Thousands of farmers, through mortgage foreclosures involving millions of dollars, had lost their farms.

Thousands of home owners, through mortgage foreclosures involving millions of dollars, had lost their homes.

The life-insurance companies, in which millions of our people had their life's savings tied up, were on the verge of collapse.

The railroads, our arteries of transportation, were fast reaching the point where they could carry on no longer.

Our foreign trade, which amounted to $5,157,083,000 in 1929, had fallen off to $1,576,151,000.

Our Federal income, which amounted to $4,033,200,000 in 1929, had fallen off to $1,888,700,000, and there was a deficit in our Federal Budget of $2,885,362,299.

Many of our States and political subdivisions were so heavily involved that default was daily being made in the payment of their bonds.

The income of the farmers, which averaged between 1924 and 1928, $9,920,000,000, and which amounted to $8,457,000,000 as late as 1930, had fallen off to $3,979,000,000 in 1932.

Wheat was selling for 44 cents per bushel, corn was selling for 28 cents per bushel, cotton was selling for 6 cents per pound, hogs were selling for 3⅕ cents per pound, and cattle were selling for 3½ cents per pound.

There was no longer any such thing as a wage scale. Laborers, those who could find work, were willing to labor for anything they could get.

Yes; we were right in the midst of the fiery furnace, being tried as never before.

THEN CAME ROOSEVELT

Into this national picture of gloom and despair stepped a man of action, a man of courage, a man of faith, a great leader—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

His first message, delivered on the day he was sworn into office, arrested the attention of the whole Nation—yea, of the whole world—and stamped him as a leader who not only knew the problems we faced but who could overcome and master them. I say it deliberately, weighing the words I use: I seriously doubt if any other message ever delivered to the American people, barring the Declaration of Independence, had such a profound effect. The whole Nation was electrified, and overnight our people gave birth to new hope and new faith in our institutions. The frosts of despair and gloom, of lost hope and shattered faith, melted in the warmth and sunshine of that immortal message. It justified the wisdom of our founders in representative government and insured the continuation of our Republic.

While his message contained nothing new in government, it was reassuring in bringing back to the people in simple, vigorous language the philosophy of government taught by the father of truly representative government, the Sage of Monticello—that governments should be administered by the chosen representative of the people in the interest of all rather than by the pawns of the powerful in the interest of the favored few. And his every act since that wonderful pronouncement justifies the statement that on that memorable occasion he was not indulging in mere vocal service, a trick too often resorted to by the demagogue, but that the fire of true democracy burned brightly in his soul.

He came preaching no new or strange doctrines, as some unacquainted with the spirit of the philosophy underlying our Government thought—and no doubt they are not to be censured for so thinking, because we had departed so far from the spirit and true intent of our original plan that the spirit of our Government had been crushed—but the God-given doctrines set forth in our Declaration of Independence, Constitution, and Bill of Rights.

He came asking for no powers inconsistent with the crisis confronting us, but only for such powers as would permit him during the emergency to act quickly and decisively in bringing relief to a stricken people.

He came advocating no changes in our fundamental laws, but insisting that the spirit of those laws be carried out by enacting such laws as would relieve human suffering and misery, protect the home owners in the enjoyment of their homes and the landowners in the enjoyment of their acres, put men to work at an honest wage and guarantee to them the right to organize in their own self-defense, curb merciless competition and unfair trade practices in business, place agriculture on a parity with industry, equalize the profits and benefits of agriculture and industry, use the national credit for the people as a whole regardless of station and rank, and protect the masses from the avaricious hand of the powerful.

How can anyone be so out of touch with the spirit of our institutions as to say we are following dangerous paths in attempting to put over such a program? I think I know something about our institutions and the spirit that prompted the founders of the Republic in building as they did. They built wisely, securely, well, and I would not change a single stone in the edifice they erected. Their philosophy of government is my philosophy of government. And believing as I do, I say unto you that I do not believe there is a single signer to the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution who, were he living today, would not subscribe to the program the man in the White House is attempting to put over.

To those who are not in sympathy with the new deal, because they know it means a square deal and no special favors will be granted, and for this reason are not only hoping and praying that it will not succeed but are actively engaged in talking and working against its success, and to those who, blinded by partisanship, had rather see their country collapse than for their party to suffer defeat, I have no advice to give. Like Nathaniel of old, they are persuaded that no good can come out of Nazareth. But to those who would like to see the new deal succeed but who have been influenced by false propaganda into putting a question mark after the policies of this administration, and to those among us of little faith, let me admonish you to seek the advice of the Master in judging the wisdom and accomplishments of this administration. Some 2,000 years ago John the Baptist, the forerunner of the Master, was in jail. Doubt and unbelief crept into his mind. He could not understand why, if the Man of Galilee was the promised Messiah, He would permit him to remain in prison. So he sent two disciples to the Master to inquire: "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?"

The Master knew what it took to convince people. He knew it would take proof, not argument, to convince John, so He said to the disciples: "Go and show John again those things which ye do hear and see: The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them." Yes, look and listen, and tell John what you see and hear. So, I say to the doubters and those of little faith, look and listen, and you will find out that in little over 1 year under the new deal wonders have been wrought in our beloved land. Yes; you will find that the hungry have been fed, the down-and-outers cared for, homes saved, farms reclaimed, industries started up, men put back to work, banks opened, security thrown around investments, the rights of labor recognized, child labor abolished, sweat ships outlawed, the farm problem given earnest consideration, and an honest effort made to equalize the rights and opportunities of our people. And you will find, too, that the faith of our people has been strengthened and that they once again look to the future with confidence and hope.

Let me briefly recount some of the major accomplishments.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Mr. Roosevelt came to the White House with a well-thought-out and constructive programs. A program, I should say, that knew no sectionalism, recognized no special political or financial obligations, so humane in its purposes as to reach the most humble, and designed to do the greatest good to the greatest number.

In considering the program and the accomplishments of the administration, we should ever keep in mind that many of the laws so far enacted were brought forth as emergency measures, and, of course, are unsuited to the needs and demands of our people in normal times, and will, of course, be discarded when the emergency is over. Some of the laws, however, are of a permanent nature and will survive the emergency. And many of the emergency measures contain provisions establishing and recognizing principles that should survive and become a part of our national policy.

R.F.C.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, commonly known as the "R.F.C.", has real accomplishments to its credit. Originally passed by a Democratic Congress under Mr. Hoover, back in January 1932, its powers have been broadened and extended by the succeeding Congresses, and since the present Congress further broadened its powers and gave it authority to make loans to small business its benign benefits will reach into every corner of our land.

Set up in 1932, primarily for the purpose of taking care of big business, it has proven to be the salvation of the banks, railroads, and insurance companies. Had it not been for the R.F.C. and Mr. Roosevelt's prompt and courageous action thereunder I seriously doubt if there would be a single solvent bank, railroad, or insurance company in the United States. That statement, I know, is pretty broad, but I honestly believe it is a true and correct statement.

Everyone realized that the President was right in his efforts to save the banks in which millions of depositors had their money, the insurance companies in which millions had their life savings tied up in insurance policies, and the railroads, our arteries of transportation. In order for us to build back, these institutions and industries had to be saved. And when Mr. Roosevelt took courageous and prompt action through the R.F.C. many of those who now question his policies proclaimed him as a great statesman and courageous leader.

The only mistake made in connection with the R.F.C. is the mistake originally made in limiting its powers of assistance to big business. This, in my opinion, was a costly mistake. The farmers, small banks, and small business needed assistance at the time and should have been provided for in the act. Had this been done, much suffering as well as loss would have been averted. We lost a lot of valuable time after the depression struck us and before Mr. Roosevelt took command.

However, after Mr. Roosevelt took command, I am telling you that we got action, and we got real serviceable and efficient action right through the R.F.C. I am going to refer to the accomplishments of the R.F.C., and when I do you will begin to see what leadership means.

Let me give you briefly some of the accomplishments of the R.F.C.:

In 1929 there were 642 bank failures involving deposits aggregating $234,532,000. This was the beginning of Mr. Hoover's administration.

In 1930 there were 1,345 bank failures involving deposits aggregating $864,715,000. This was under Mr. Hoover. No action.

In 1931 there were 2,298 bank failures involving deposits aggregating $1,691,510,000. This was under Mr. Hoover. No action.

In 1932 we had 1,456 bank failures involving deposits aggregating $715,626,000. This was under Mr. Hoover, and the R.F.C. was in existence, but very little action taken except to assist a few of the larger banks.

From January 1, 1933, to March 4, 1933, there were 420 bank failures involving deposits of around $200,000,000. Still under Mr. Hoover, and the R.F.C. still in existence, but both dead as they had been in 1932. In addition 1,417 national banks with deposits aggregating $2,207,964,000 failed to open after the bank holiday and, of course, these banks should be added to Mr. Hoover's list.

When Mr. Roosevelt assumed command he had to close the banks in order to save them. It was the only sensible thing to do. He realized what the do-nothing policy up to that time had done. He realized that faith and confidence had to be restored in the banks. Had Mr. Roosevelt not taken this courageous action I doubt, in 10 days' time, if there would have been a single bank in the United States open.

So far I have dealt with National and State banks. I am sorry I do not have the figures as to what has happened to the State banks that failed to open after the bank holiday, but I do have the record as to national banks. After the bank holiday, March 16, 1933, there were 1,417 national banks that were not allowed to open for one reason or another. In these banks there were deposits aggregating $2,207,964,000. By the first of May 1934, 87 percent of these banks had reopened and 85 percent of the remaining banks had received approved reorganization plans, leaving only 29 of the 1,417 banks that had not worked out of their difficulties; and these 29 banks only had deposits aggregating $16,281,000, which is less than three-quarters of 1 percent of the $2,207,964,000 in frozen deposits in the 1,417 banks on March 16, 1933. That is what the R.F.C. and the comptroller did in 1 year under real leadership. I believe the figures covering State banks will make a similar showing. And in the face of such a record there are those who say the new deal is not working.

But I have not given you the best part of the record. The Congress under the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt, and over the protest of the Tories, passed the deposit-insurance law which, in my opinion, is the greatest banking act ever passed, and this law went into effect January 1, 1934. Since January 1, 1934, there hasn't been a single bank failure. If you do not believe in the efficacy of the deposit-insurance law let me call your attention to the fact that the average number of bank failures in the United States during the 10-year period from 1923 to 1932, occurring during the first 5 months of each year—the period the deposit guarantee law has been in effect—amounted to around 500 each 5 months. During the first 5 months of this year we have not had a single failure, and this is largely due, in my opinion, to the deposit guaranty law. And I want to call your attention to the further fact that bank deposits under the guarantee law have increased around $2,000,000,000.

Now let us see what part the R.F.C. has played:

As I have stated, the R.F.C., except as to big business, played an unimportant part in recovery until Mr. Roosevelt took command. Since then it has made a wonderful record.

The R.F.C. has authorized loans to 7,080 National and State banks aggregating $1,995,061,938.17. Of this amount, $233,810,926.83 was canceled or withdrawn, $208,331,108.73 remain to the credit of the borrowers and $1,552,919,902.61 has been paid out in cash, of which amount $925,459,565.06, or 60 percent has been repaid. And since the law has been liberalized as to loans to closed banks by the present session of Congress greater relief may be expected.

In addition, since the passage of the Emergency Banking Act, the R.F.C. has authorized or made conditional agreements to purchase $659,380,000 of preferred stock in 3,278 banks and trust companies, and is ready and willing to take stock in other banks.

Now, let us get a birdseye view of the bank record under Mr. Hoover and under Mr. Roosevelt:

UNDER MR. HOOVER

	Number of bank failures	Amount of deposits involved
1929	642	$234,532,000
1930	1,345	864,715,000
1931	2,298	1,691,510,000
1932	1,456	715,626,000
1933 to Mar. 4 to which should be added banks that failed to open after bank holiday	420 1,417	200,000,000 2,207,964,000
Total	7,578	5,914,287,000

UNDER MR. ROOSEVELT

1934	None.	None.

The record the R.F.C. has made in saving, reopening, and assisting banks alone, in my opinion, more than justifies its existence.

In order that you may have a more comprehensive picture of the activities of the R.F.C., let me state that it had made total disbursements as of April 30, 1934, of $5,139,430,378.43, and received in repayments the sum of $1,382,828,921.45. And in order for you to better understand the varied industries and businesses, other than banks, that have been assisted let me enumerate a few:

Amount of loans

Railroads	$402,506,101.49
Insurance companies	89,326,758.56
Mortgage loan companies	251,750,042.91
Building and loan associations	114,132,053.07
Self-liquidating projects	86,604,429.52
To Commodity Credit Corporation on cotton	98,995,171.93
To Commodity Credit Corporation on corn	86,798,152.62
Federal Relief Administration	487,060,753.16
Secretary of Agriculture—crop loans to farmers	115,000,000.00
Farm Loan Commissioner to make loan to farmers	145,000,000.00
Capital Stock Home Loan Bank	80,445,700.00
Capital Home Owners' Loan Corporation	69,000,000.00
States, Territories, and political subdivisions for relief	299,984,999.00
Livestock Credit Corporation	12,668,733.05

Surely no one familiar with the work of the R.F.C. can question for one moment the splendid part it has played in recovery, or the efficient manner in which it has functioned.

RECAPITULATION

First. Thousands of homes and business properties saved through its loans to mortgage and building and loan companies.

Second. Railroads in much better financial position and, most of them, should now be able to weather the storm.

Third. Insurance companies saved and practically all of them now on a sound financial basis. This means the insurance policies in which millions of our people had their life savings tied up will be paid in full.

Fourth. Banks upon a sound financial basis.

Fifth. Not a single bank failure in 1934.

A.A.A.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act, commonly known as the "A.A.A.", to say the least, is an honest effort to place agriculture upon an equality with industry and equalize the profits and benefits thereof between the farmers and those who process and handle farm products. And when I say it is an honest effort to accomplish those ends, and the first real honest to goodness effort put forth by an administration to accomplish those ends, I mean exactly what I say. And I want to say another thing: The principles of the act were conceived by real Americans, deeply in sympathy with the farmers, and who have courage enough not only to talk, but to act. Talking officials and legislators, singing songs of praises to the farmers, as if praise singing would raise the price level of farm products, had just about ruined the farmer. We have been getting action since March 4, 1933.

You may ridicule the "brain trusters" all you please, but you cannot wipe out the record made by the Agricultural Department during the past year by ridicule. When you get through considering the record I believe you will agree with me that gray matter is not a bad thing to have over in the Department. Another thing about the "brain trusters": Some of them may not be practical farmers, but they have brains, and for the first time in the history of the Department, so far as I know, had brains enough to call in the farmers themselves to assist and advise in working out the different farm programs. In other words, the cotton growers worked out their own program, the wheat farmers their program, the tobacco growers their program, and so forth. That is not only showing brain work, but brain work of the best variety, the common-sense variety. And as long as the Department goes to the farmers themselves who, better than anyone else know their own problems, for counsel and advice, I am not afraid of the results.

And I want to say another thing: I am not in sympathy with those who seem to think the Agriculture Department is trying to Hitlerize the farmers. Why, you know and I know that the farmer is the most individualistic citizen in the world and that you had as well try to change the spots of the leopard as to curb his individualistic nature or destroy his freedom of action. If I thought for one moment that the Department of Agriculture contemplated in any way curbing the freedom of the farmer, I would take my coat off and resist the movement in every possible way. All I have got to say about this Hitler business is this: If the farmer has been Hitlerized, he Hitlerized himself.

The farm program, with one exception, is a voluntary program. It has not been imposed upon the farmers. It has been worked out in cooperation with the farmers. The element of force does not enter into it. In an effort to raise the price level of agricultural products the Department of Agriculture, in conjunction with the State agencies and the farmers themselves, has worked out what is known as the "crop-reduction program", and this program, I may add, depends entirely upon the cooperation of the farmers themselves. I do not know of any farmers who think they are being Hitlerized. So far as I know, the farmers have been practically unanimous in their support of the program. And I want to call particular attention to the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, when the Bankhead cotton bill was before the committee, which is the only legislation the element of compulsion enters into, stated that the only reason he was in favor of the legislation was because over 95 percent of the cotton growers had asked for its passage.

And we should ever keep in mind when considering the Agricultural Adjustment Act that it is an emergency act, designed primarily to take care of the farm situation until the farmers can get back on their feet. I think I know something about the farm problem and the men who have been trying to work it out. As a member of the Agriculture Committee I have been living with the problems for the past 3 years. And I want to say that no governmental officials ever worked harder, ever worked more sincerely and honestly to solve the problems of agriculture, than those in authority today.

The farmers are at last getting a break, and if we keep men in command like MARVIN JONES, Chairman of the House

Agriculture Committee, and Secretary Wallace, they will soon be on top. The criticism that has developed, if you will trace it to its source, you will find, is coming from the packers, the millers, the stockyards, the tobacco manufacturers, and the balance of that crowd that has fattened at the expense of the farmer long enough.

Not only has the administration made an honest effort to raise the prices of farm products, it has also made an honest effort to save the homes of the farmers. The Farm Credit Administration, set up by President Roosevelt, during its first year, loaned the American farmers $1,273,000,000. Of this amount $791,000,000 was loaned to 316,000 American farmers by the Federal Land Bank and Land Bank Commissioner. The balance of the amount went to the farmers on their crops, livestock, and so forth. And this money has not only helped the farmers, but the banks, insurance companies, and farm creditors in general. Of the $791,000,000 loaned to farmers on their lands, $218,230,000 went to commercial banks, $82,480,000 to insurance companies, $21,900,000 for taxes, and $381,540,000 to private mortgage companies, merchants, and other unclassified types of rural creditors. It will be readily seen, therefore, that this money not only saved the farmers, but in all probability many banks and other businesses.

RESULTS

But the best way to measure the efficacy of the farm legislation is by the results it has produced. Let me give you a few of the results:

The average yearly income of the American farmers from 1924 to 1928 amounted to $9,920,000,000, and this income had dropped off to $3,979,000,000 for the period terminating May 1, 1934. What happened to this income during the next year under the Agricultural Adjustment Act? Well, let me tell you. The A.A.A. brought the farmers' income up to $5,530,000,000, an increase of over $1,500,000,000 in 1 year, which amounts to an increase of 39 percent. And to those who would have you believe that this increase was in the form of rentals and benefit payments made to the farmers, let me say that only 12 percent of the increase came from rentals and benefit payments.

Now, let us see how the basic farm commodities originally included in the act—cotton, tobacco, wheat, corn, and hogs—have fared:

The cotton growers received for their cotton and cottonseed in 1932 the sum of $425,488,000. For their 1933 cotton and cottonseed the same cotton growers received $856,776,000, an increase of $431,288,000. So the A.A.A. put $431,288,000 in the cotton growers' pockets the first year.

The tobacco growers received for their 1932 crop of tobacco $104,529,000. For the year 1933 the same tobacco growers received $214,130,000, an increase of $109,601,000. So the A.A.A. put $109,601,000 in the tobacco growers' pockets the first year.

The wheat growers received for their 1932 wheat crop $194,846,000. For the year 1933 the same wheat farmers received $367,153,000, an increase of $172,307,000. So the A.A.A. put $172,307,000 in the wheat growers' pockets the first year.

The hog raisers received for their 1932 hogs $428,000,000. For the year 1933 the same hog raisers received around $457,000,000, an increase of around $29,000,000. So the A.A.A. put $29,000,000 in the pockets of the hog raisers the first year. And in connection with hogs I want to state that the processing tax did not go on until November 1933, hence no benefit payments have been made. It is estimated that the hog raisers during 1934 will receive at least $200,000,000 in benefit payments under the processing tax, so if the hog price holds its own the hog raisers will receive some $200,000,000 more in 1934.

The corn farmers received for their 1932 corn crop $146,090,000. For the year 1933 the same farmers received $242,117,000, an increase of $96,027,000. So the A.A.A. put $96,027,000 in the corn raisers' pockets the first year.

When the A.A.A. was originally enacted the cattlemen did not desire to come under the act, hence cattle were left out. I thought at the time a mistake was being made, as the omission left the Secretary of Agriculture practically helpless in dealing with the cattle situation. During the present session of Congress the cattlemen from all over the United States met here in Washington and decided to come under the act, and the A.A.A. was amended to include cattle, and since then the cattlemen, in cooperation with the Department, have been working out a program. And I call attention to the critics of the act that since cattle were included and since the Department and the cattlemen have been working on a program that there has been a substantial advance in the price of cattle; and my opinion is that as soon as the program has been worked out and put into effect we will have a fairly decent cattle market.

As my district is so vitally affected by the cattle price, I did everything in my power to get cattle included in the act originally, and I kept on fighting until we finally got them in. The cattlemen are solely to blame for cattle being left out of the act originally. Whether it will be wise to put the processing-tax feature into effect as to cattle I express no opinion at this time. The mere fact that cattle are under the act and the processing tax can be imposed if deemed advisable will have a splendid effect. Moreover, since cattle are under the act a cattle program can now be worked out. This was impossible as long as we left cattle out of the act.

Now, let us recapitulate and get a birdseye view of the entire picture. The object of the A.A.A. was to bring the price of farm products up to the 1909–14 price level, and cotton, wheat, tobacco, hogs, and corn were originally included in the act as basic farm commodities to experiment on. Let us see how near the act has accomplished its purposes:

	1909–14 average price level	The 1932 average price level	Mar. 15, 1934, price, including benefit payments
	Cents	Cents	Cents
Wheat, per bushel	88.40	39.0	85.90
Cotton, per pound	12.40	5.8	13.70
Tobacco, do	10.40	7.4	14.00
Hogs, do	7.22	3.5	6.13
Corn, per bushel	64.20	28.0	52.10

Just one other picture as to the commodities included under the act:

	Income received by growers in 1932	Income received by growers in 1933, including benefit payments	Gain of 1933 over 1932
Cotton	$425,488,000	$856,776,000	$431,288,000
Tobacco	104,529,000	214,130,000	109,601,000
Wheat	194,846,000	367,153,000	172,307,000
Hogs	428,000,000	457,000,000	29,000,000
Corn	146,090,000	242,117,000	96,027,000

As my district and State are so vitally affected by the tobacco prices, I will give the results under the act on the different types of tobacco.

Type	Amount received by growers in 1932	Amount received by growers in 1933
Flue-cured	$43,538,000	$124,600,000
Burley	39,457,000	55,850,000
Maryland	4,155,000	4,705,000
Fire-cured	7,531,000	12,500,000
Dark air-cured	1,655,000	3,475,000
Cigar leaf	8,193,000	13,000,000
Total	104,529,000	214,130,000

The net result of the farm program for the first year is over 300,000 American farms saved through refinancing and the cash income of the American farmers increased over $1,500,000.

And if that is not a good year's work, then I should like for some of the critics to tell me why.

N.R.A.

The National Recovery Act, commonly referred to as the N.R.A., may not be perfect, and I am not contending that it is, because, in my opinion, many hardships and injustices are being practiced under it, but as imperfect as it is, it will go down in history as labor's first bill of rights and industries' first code of honor.

The prime objects of the act are, first, to get rid of the ruthless competition and unfair trade practices in industry; and, second, to put men to work, shorten the hours of labor, and raise the wage scale, and thus permit labor to share in the profits and benefits of industry.

Under it many unfair trade practices are being eliminated, and ruthless competition, which, in its final analysis, was paid for by labor in the reduction of wages, is becoming a thing of the past.

Under it millions of men and women have been put to work, the hours of labor shortened, and the wages of labor increased.

Under it child labor has been practically abolished and the sweatshop has become a thing of the past. If it had nothing else to its credit, these two humane and merciful provisions in the act would stamp it as one of the outstanding pieces of legislation of the century.

I realize that there is a great deal of criticism of the N.R.A., and some of it, I must admit, is justified. What we need, however, is constructive criticism, made by those in sympathy with the fundamental principles and who are honestly striving to eliminate the bad and preserve the good. In time this will come. We should not become impatient. It is too much to expect that an act of such far-reaching consequences can be put in operation overnight. It will take time to eliminate the dross from the gold.

And let me say in passing that the act has so far accomplished much, and the harsh and sometimes silly criticisms that are directed against it are of no avail. You know you cannot get rid of accomplishments by ridicule, by calling the Blue Eagle a "buzzard", and such tommyrot. Buzzards, you know, do not put men back to work, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, or put faith and hope in the hearts of men, a song on the lips of our women, and the rose color in the cheeks of the children. Buzzards destroy.

And let me say another thing: Many of the men who so characterize the Blue Eagle are more like the buzzard at heart than the Blue Eagle is like the buzzard in looks. The Blue Eagle, the emblem of the N.R.A., stands for human rights, while the human buzzards that would tear down the things it stands for, like the feathered tribe, believe in picking human bones.

As I have stated, the best way to judge the efficiency of any measure is to consider the results it has produced. Measured by such a test, the N.R.A. is a success.

Let me give you some of the results:

(a) Employment: Under date of May 24, 1934, there appeared in the New York Times a statement from the National Industrial Conference Board, which is a nonpartisan board representing labor, capital, and industry, relative to the unemployment situation. This statement, coming as it does from a nonpartisan agency, is probably the most accurate statement on the situation that has appeared. Here is the statement:

The following table shows the number of unemployed workers in the various industrial groups in March 1933, March 1934, and April 1934:

Industrial group	Number of unemployed
	March 1933	March 1934	April 1934
Extraction of minerals	576,000	459,000	491,000
Manufacturing and mechanical	6,423,000	2,599,000	2,500,000
Transportation	1,591,000	1,422,000	1,415,000
Trade	2,126,000	1,020,000	961,000
Domestic and personal service	607,000	432,000	427,000
Industry not specified	539,000	420,000	417,000
Other industries [1]	296,000	296,000	296,000
All industries	12,158,000	6,647,000	6,506,000
Allowance for new workers since 1930 census	1,045,000	1,374,000	1,401,000
Total unemployed	13,203,000	8,021,000	7,907,000

[1] This group includes agriculture, forestry, and fishing, public service and professional service. The number given is that of the unemployed in 1930, no figures being available from which later changes in employment can be computed.

This statement shows that unemployment under the N.R.A. has been reduced in 1 year from 13,203,000 to 7,907,000, which means that during the year 5,296,000 men and women were put back to work, which is truly a wonderful record.

While the above figures are somewhat higher than the figures gotten out by the Department of Labor, there is no disputing the fact that the N.R.A. has put millions of men and women back to work.

(b) Wages: Increase in wages between March 1933 and March 1934, clearly shows that the N.R.A. has been of inestimable benefit to the laboring people.

Wages increased per hour

	Percent
Factory	22
Anthracite coal	63
Bituminous coal	91
Retail trade	26

(c) Volume of business: From the list I am about to give you a fair idea can be obtained as to the general increase in the volume of business.

	1932 production	1933 production	March 1933 production	March 1934 production
Automobiles.....number	1,370,675	1,989,945	118,002	336,013
Bituminous coal.....tons	309,710,000	327,940,000	23,665,000	38,497,000
Pig iron.....do	8,657,000	13,211,000	542,000	1,620,000
Cotton sales.....bales	5,016,000	6,210,000	495,000	544,000
Freight-car loading.....cars	28,180,000	29,037,000	2,355,000	3,059,000

(d) Profit or loss: The following list gives a fair idea as to whether or not business is recovering under the N.R.A.:

	1933, loss for first quarter	1934, profit for first quarter
International Nickel Co	$80,158	$5,049,270
Montgomery Ward	2,196,099	2,261,097
Southern Ry	1,965,257	31,743
Caterpillar Tractor Co	391,780	1,154,393
Radio Corporation	478,103	1,235,725

(e) Commercial failures: The decrease in commercial failures clearly shows that business under the N.R.A. is getting upon a sounder basis.

	1932	1933	March 1933	March 1934
Number	31,822	20,307	1,948	1,162
Liabilities	$928,313,000	$502,830,000	$48,500,000	$29,228,000

(f) Foreign trade:

	1932	1933	March 1933	March 1934
Exports	$1,576,151,000	$1,647,220,000	$106,293,000	$187,495,000
Imports	1,322,774,000	1,449,559,000	94,860,000	153,075,000

The cost of living, it is true, has gone up, but not far, if any, out of proportion to the general rise in commodity prices, wages, and so forth.

Here are the figures showing increase in the cost of living from March 1933 to March 1934.

	Percent
Total of all groups	9.3
Clothing	27.0
Food	20.0
Fuel and light	1.5
Sundries	3.1
Housing	[1] 2.3

Now, let me give you a bird's-eye view of the change in the business picture from March 1933 to March 1934:

	Percent
Increase in factory employment	37
Increase in factory pay	22
Increase in retail trade pay	26
Increase in factory pay rolls	72
Increase in retail employment	22
Increase in manufacturing production	48

[1] Decrease.

	Percent
Increase in automobile production	194
Increase in iron and steel production	200
Increase in mineral production	25
Increase in electricity used	35
Increase in freight-car loading	31
Increase in value of 421 representative stocks	86
Increase in department-store sales	46
Increase in variety-store sales	86
Increase in construction contracts awarded	197.4
Increase in rural general-store sales	66
Increase in wholesale prices	22.4
Increase in the cost of living	9.3
Decrease in commercial failures	44

Now, if you think the N.R.A. is a bad thing just go to those industrialists who desire to do an honest and legitimate business and ask them if they want to get rid of it. They will tell you "no." Just ask the laboring people if they want to get rid of it. They will tell you "no." Well, the N.R.A. primarily affects industry and labor, and they are agreed that fundamentally it is right.

I admit that there are adjustments to be made in the N.R.A., but these adjustments should be made by those who are in sympathy with the act so there will be no danger of jeopardizing the principles upon which it rests.

It is my candid opinion that the principles of the N.R.A. rightly applied will do more to equalize the profits and benefits of industry than all other laws ever enacted.

OTHER LEGISLATION

I have gone rather fully into the major pieces of legislation. I am sorry that I do not have time to go into the other legislative measures in the same way. May I be permitted, however, to call your attention to some of these measures.

(a) The Securities Act will prevent the sale of worthless stocks and bonds and save the public from being duped out of millions of dollars each year.

(b) The bill regulating the stock exchange will, I hope, prevent the wild and destructive speculation that was prevalent during the Hoover administration.

(c) The amendment to the income tax law designed to prevent the rich from manipulating their tax returns so as to escape taxation, as the Senate investigation revealed many had been doing will, I hope, insure honest returns and thus greatly increase our Federal income from this source.

(d) The bill creating the Tennessee Valley Authority has already opened our eyes to the unreasonable rates the power companies have been charging for electric current and, together with the bill directing an investigation of power rates, will, I believe, result in the American people saving millions of dollars each year on their electric-power bills.

(e) The Tariff Act giving the President the right to adjust tariff rates will, I believe, greatly promote our foreign trade, and thus give an outlet for our surplus products and commodities.

(f) Under the act creating the Home Owners' Loan Corporation as of June 1, 1934, 274,980 American homes had been saved. The loans as of that date amounted to $822,829,888. Had it not been for this act I do not know what the American home owners would have done. The money loaned on the homes, like the money loaned on the farms, has helped practically all classes—the banks, the mortgage companies, the counties and cities in the way of taxes, and many other creditors of the home owners.

(g) The relief acts designed to provide for those unable to help themselves clearly shows that this administration recognizes the governmental responsibility of coming to the relief of those in distress. The human side of this administration, as exemplified in the great relief measures, certainly demonstrates the fact that the American Government still has a soul, and just so long as the American Government keeps its soul it will live and prosper.

(h) And I should also mention the act providing for the homestead projects in different sections of the country. This is a great movement, a movement in the right direction, and I am looking for real and permanent accomplishments to be the result of the movement.

Yes, it has ben a wonderful year, and a year of real achievements that every red-blooded American, regardless of politics, should be proud of.

BALANCE SHEET

In order to find out how we stood in March 1933 under Hoover, and how we stand today under Roosevelt, let us make off a balance sheet.

	Hoover	Roosevelt
1. Federal income collected up to June 6, 1933 on fiscal year ending June 1, 1933	$1,831,309,309.33

[4] Loss.
[5] Profit.
[6] Under President Roosevelt.

Which side of the ledger are you on? I am standing foursquare under Roosevelt's column of the ledger, and I believe the great majority of the American people are standing under the same column and in the coming election will return men to Congress who will uphold his policies.

And in this connection let me say that Mr. Roosevelt could not have put over his wonderful program had it not been for the able democratic leadership in the Senate and House. Speaker RAINEY and Floor Leader BYRNS, of the House, and Leader ROBINSON and his splendid lieutenants in the Senate, have rendered a valuable service to the whole country.

THN CAME THE TORIES

When the President came to the aid of big interests—the banks, insurance corporations and railroads—as I have heretofore shown, his program dealing with such matters met with the hearty approval and cooperation of the Tories. The President then was a great statesman, a man of vision, a courageous leader, and there is no doubt about it, because big interests so testified.

But the Tories, having gotten their feet under the table, having been filled at the public trough to the point of gorging, are unwilling to get up and let the farmers, the small business men, the laboring people, and just ordinary folks, take a seat and get a square meal, but like Dives of old insist that they feed, as did Lazarus, from the crumbs.

As soon as they began to realize that under the new deal the Government would be run in the interest of all and that they could no longer issue orders to those in authority, they commenced to resort to every conceivable method to discredit the administration of their benefactor.

Let me recall some of the things they have done:

When they found out that the President thought that the profits of industry should be more equally distributed, and that this could be accomplished by increasing the pay of the workingman, in order to discredit the administration they predicted, among other things, that our coal mines would become the habitat of bats and hoot owls and that smoke would no longer issue forth from our factory smokestacks; but to their consternation our coal industry is upon a sounder basis than it has been for the past 25 years, and, daily, smoke is issuing forth from new smokestacks.

When they found out that the President thought that the farmers should receive something more than the cost of production for the products of the soil and should really share in the profits and benefits of agriculture, and the farm-relief measures were enacted, they commenced to holler that the Department of Agriculture was in the hands of brain trusters; but to their consternation the farm problem has steadily improved and the prices of farm products are on the upward grade.

When they found out that the President did not intend to sit idly by and see the public yearly robbed of billions of dollars through the sale of worthless securities, and the Securities Act was passed, in order to discredit the administration, they openly stated that the law would paralyze industry; but to their consternation they found out that public opinion believed that the industry offering stocks and bonds for sale that was unwilling to make a full and true disclosure of its financial condition and the assets back of the securities offered for sale was a crooked industry and should not only be paralyzed but killed.

When they found out that the President did not believe one of the legitimate functions of the stock exchange was to fleece the public to enrich the Tories, and the stock exchange bill was passed, in order to discredit the administration they spent millions of dollars falsely propagandizing the people that the passage of the bill would not only retard but prohibit recovery; but to their consternation recovery is improving every day and has improved to such an extent that there are those among us who think that further relief measures are unnecessary.

When they found out that the President thought more of honest dollars than he does of gold dollars, and the gold-revaluation bill was passed, in order to discredit the administration they predicted a collapse of our financial system; but to their consternation the financial collapse failed to materialize.

THE INSURRECTION CAMPAIGN OF FEAR LAUNCHED BY THE TORIES

Having failed in all their prophecies, they became desperate. Something had to be done to discredit the administration that was daily gaining favor with the masses, even if it took a revolution to accomplish their end; so out to the city of the Steel Trust the money barons and Tories, banded together under the patriotic name of the "Committee for the Nation", went in search of their deliverer, and there was much rejoicing when they found Dr. William Albert Wirt, A.B., A.M., Ph.B., Ph.D., the Don Quixote of Gary. The only difference between the illustrious Spaniard and Dr. William Albert Wirt, A.B., A.M., Ph.B., Ph.D., is the fact that the Spaniard's imagination worked without stimulant or excuse, while it took a cocktail or two, probably three or four, for the good doctor to work his imagination up to the point where, bleary-eyed, he found a Kerensky in the President, a Trotsky in the brilliant, poetic Dr. Tugwell, and a Stalin in a fair, faithful, and innocent female Government clerk. If the good doctor had seen a windmill that night, he would have sworn by the Eternal that it was a Russian zeppelin attempting to bomb the Capitol!

Well, the cocktail revolution died aborning and the only casualties reported are former Senator Jim Reed, the Blackstone of the revolution, and Don Quixote Wirt, A.B., A.M., Ph.B., Ph.D., of the city of the Steel Trust.

Why, the Whisky Rebellion that took place during the early stages of our Republic was more of a success; so, if in the future the good doctor decides to start another rebellion I suggest that he use plain whisky rather than cocktails mixed by his former secretary.

Some day—may it be many years in the future—the good doctor will be called to his reward, and I hope his compatriots will mark his last resting place with an imposing shaft. He deserves it. His name should be perpetuated. And as a fitting tribute to his accomplishments while here on earth, I now suggest the following epitaph:

Through with insurrections
but
Hoping for a glorious resurrection,
Here lies the body of
Dr. William Albert Wirt, A.B., A.M., Ph.B., Ph.D.,
The Don Quixote of Gary and the Father of the Cocktail Rebellion.
May the shades of Kerensky, Trotski, Stalin, and the "brain trusters"
Visit not this spot.

THE REGIMENTATION CAMPAIGN OF FEAR LAUNCHED BY THE TORIES

Having adopted as their main line of attack the doctrine of fear, and the cocktail rebellion having failed to give any one the creeps or the jitters, they now holler regimentation.

Why, they are going around talking regimentation like it was a new monster of some kind. They are doing their best to create the impression among ordinary folks, very few of whom know what the word means, that Mr. Roosevelt is trying to regiment them. They do not take time to explain what Mr. Roosevelt is trying to do, but leave the impression that to be regimented is about the next thing to being a galley slave.

I said ordinary folks do not know anything about regimentation; and they do not, because they never practiced it. Not so with Wall Street. Why, Wall Street was practicing regimentation before Trotsky, Stalin, Hitler, and Mussolini and the remainder of the regimenters were born!

Well, being just an ordinary fellow, and not being familiar with the word as applied to government, and here of late reading about it and hearing about it, got my curiosity aroused to the point where I decided to look it up and find out what all the talk was about. I consulted Mr. Webster and several other minor authorities, and since my laborious research has ended, feel qualified to talk about regimentation myself.

Now, for just a few minutes let us look into this business of regimentation.

First, what does it mean? Well, in plain English, it means Government control. You know, in the Army a colonel is in command or control of a regiment, and bosses their conduct and action more or less. Of course, he has a lot of help in the way of captains and lieutenants and such, but he is the big guy in control. So when the Government steps in and says it is going to regulate the stock exchange, protect the public from buying worthless stocks and bonds by regulating the sale thereof, control our financial policies by regulating money and credits, prohibit unfair trade practices and competition, Wall Street, who has been the big guy, doing most of these very things through its captains and lieutenants, and who had rather die than surrender its prerogative to the Government, in order to frighten the people and get them set against the Government doing these things in the interest of the people, hollers "regimentation."

Such a cry comes with poor grace from Wall Street. Wall Street that has for years controlled our large industries and through them regimented our laboring people; Wall Street that has for years controlled our stockyards, and through them regimented our cattlemen; Wall Street that has for years controlled our tobacco manufacturers, and through them regimented our tobacco growers; Wall Street that has for years controlled our grain exchanges and produce markets, and through them regimented our farmers; Wall Street that has for years controlled our money and credits, and through them regimented practically every man, woman, and child in America, now has the effrontery to accuse this administration of doing, in the interest of the people, the very things it has been doing for years for selfish purposes.

Let me tell Wall Street and the Tories this: If we ever have governmental regimentation, it will be for the purpose of supplanting Wall Street regimentation.

I am against regimentation in any form. I stand for the liberties guaranteed to us under the bill of rights and the Constitution. But if the good Lord is going to regiment me, then may He do it through my Government and not through Wall Street. Give me governmental regimentation—which can only come by a majority of our people favoring it—every day to Wall Street regimentation.

But the fact is that neither Mr. Roosevelt, Secretary Wallace, nor Dr. Tugwell, nor anyone else connected with the administration is trying to regiment anyone. What this administration is trying to do is to forever banish Wall Street regimentation. It is trying to take labor from under the regimentation of capital; it is trying to take the cattlemen from under the regimentation of the packers; it is trying to take the tobacco growers from under the regimentation of the warehousemen and large tobacco manufacturers; it is trying to take the farmers from under the regimentation of the millers and grain manipulators; and it is trying to take our money and credits from under the regimentation of the international bankers. And if Wall Street calls these things "regimentation", then I am for regimentation.

Oh, but they say the Bankhead cotton-control bill is regimentation. Well, if it is, and I am not prepared to say it is not, then it has this in its favor: It is self-imposed regimentation; that is, it was brought about by the cotton growers themselves. Over 95 percent of the cotton growers asked for the bill, and the President and Secretary of Agriculture only approved it after this overwhelming demand, and then only as a temporary emergency measure.

And let me say that when 95 percent of the growers of cotton are agreed upon a law regulating their business, I am not prepared to say that you are doing violence to the principles taught by Jefferson in giving it to them.

THE BUREAUCRATIC CAMPAIGN OF FEAR LAUNCHED BY THE TORIES

And the Tories are using another method of attack against the administration. Knowing that the rank and file of the American people are against government by commissions and bureaus, they are now claiming that Mr. Roosevelt is setting up a bureaucratic government. Such an argument comes, I say, with poor grace from the Tories, who are responsible for most of the bureaus and commissions afflicting our Government today. They are familiar with Mr. Roosevelt's record and the things he stands for, and know that such a cry is pure "bunk." I have fought bureaucracy all of my life and am as strongly against it today as ever. I believe in a representative government administered by the representatives of the people, and so does Mr. Roosevelt. The Tories know this. And they also know that the emergency confronting Mr. Roosevelt when he took command demanded action, immediate action, and that it became neccessary for him, as it did for Mr. Wilson during the war, to set up bureaus and commissions to carry out the emergency measures.

To those who are crying bureaucracy in order to frighten the American people let me propound a few questions:

First. Kindly tell the home owners what good it would do for Congress to provide $2,000,000,000 to refinance homes unless some agency was set up to loan the money to the home owners desiring to refinance?

Second. Kindly tell the farmers what good it would do for Congress to provide for refinancing farm mortgages unless some agency was set up to loan the money to the farmers desiring to refinance?

Also tell the farmers what good it would do for Congress to enact the farm emergency legislation unless some agency was set up to administer the laws?

Third. Kindly tell the bankers, insurance companies, and railroads what good it would do for Congress to appropriate huge sums for their relief unless some agency was set up to loan the money?

Fourth. And kindly tell those who are hungry and in distress what good it would do for Congress to appropriate huge sums for relief unless some agency was set up to feed the hungry and clothe the naked?

When they answer those questions the weakness of their charges will become apparent.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CAMPAIGN OF FEAR LAUNCHED BY THE TORIES

Oh, but the Tories say that Mr. Roosevelt is riding roughshod over the Constitution. It makes me sick to hear such an argument coming from such a source. Where were the Tories when our Constitution was adopted? It is useless for me to tell you because every red-blooded American knows. They didn't assist in bringing our Constitution into being and God knows I am not looking to that crowd to defend and preserve it now. Let me tell you that Mr. Roosevelt's ancestors were here when our Constitution was adopted, and they were not Tories! The Roosevelts helped prepare the way for our Constitution, have lived under it since it was adopted, ever guarded and defended its pronouncements, and as for me I know it is in safe hands when a Roosevelt—especially Franklin D.—takes an oath to uphold and defend it.

And I do not believe the Tories will get very far with the argument. When they go to the cotton growers who have been benefited by millions of dollars under the laws the Tories now say are unconstitutional, what are they going to say? When they go to the depositors in the banks that have been saved, the home owners who have been protected, and the farmers who have saved their farms and profited by receiving higher prices for their farm products under the laws the Tories now say are unconstitutional, what are they going to say? And when they go to the children who have been freed from work, to the laboring people whose rights have been guaranteed, and to the hungry who have been fed under the laws the Tories now say are unconstitutional, what are they going to say? Well, let me tell you what they are going to say: "May it please God never to let a Tory pass upon the Constitution of the United States!" And to that answer I say amen! and again amen!

THE "BRAIN TRUSTERS'" CAMPAIGN OF FEAR LAUNCHED BY THE TORIES

Now, let me repeat what I have already said: Brains have never wrecked a government, though many governments have been wrecked for lack of brains. The greatest protection the American people have today, in my opinion, is that we have brains at the head of this Government and scattered through the governmental departments and through the House and Senate. And our recovery since the dark hour when Mr. Roosevelt took command is due to the fact we have been doing more brain work and less "politicating" since March 4, 1933, and my candid opinion is that we will get along better if we keep it up until, at least, we get out of this depression.

Where is all of this "brain truster" stuff coming from, anyway? Run it down and you will find that it is coming from the Tory gang that practically wrecked this country and, in a large measure, brought on the depression. They are trying to get back in the saddle, and in order to accomplish their end are resorting to every conceivable method to create fear in the hearts and minds of the American people. Why, of course, that gang is against brains in government. They want pawns who will do their bidding, and not men with honest brains, who are earnestly striving to run our Government in the interest of all.

Here is the rub: We have as many brains in Washington these days as you will find on Wall Street, and because the Washington brains can checkmate the sinister moves made by the Wall Street brains, why the Wall Street brains are simply trying to get rid of the brains down in Washington, knowing that this will have to be done before they can get back in the saddle. My opinion is that they will never again be able to dupe the farmers, laborers, small business men, and just ordinary folks in falling for the bait. Folks, the bait has a hook in it; do not forget that.

THE JEFFERSONIAN CAMPAIGN OF FEAR LAUNCHED BY THE TORIES

But of all the ridiculous things I ever heard is the argument the Tories are making in which they advise the Democrats to stand by the teaching of Jefferson. Why, some of the Tories are going so far as to say they are disciples of Thomas Jefferson. Think of it; the crowd that in days that have come and gone branded Jefferson as a radical, a disturber of the people, an unsafe leader, and a demagogue, now calling upon the people to hearken back to the teachings of Jefferson in order to be delivered from the teaching of Roosevelt. Why, Roosevelt is the greatest living exponent of the teaching of Jefferson, and, in my opinion, if Jefferson were living today, he would be the President's strongest and most loyal supporter.

Poor Jefferson! I am glad he died before becoming disgraced by Tory support.

No one is being fooled by these fear manufacturers. We all know that the object of their ghost stories is to scare the people away while big business recaptures the Government. They were all against the new deal and all it stands for in the beginning, are against it now, and will continue to be against it. The philosophy of the new deal—human rights are higher and more sacred than property rights—and which is the same philosophy of government preached by Jefferson, is diametrically opposed to their philosophy of government—property rights are superior to human rights—dollars, nickels, and cents before men, women, and children.

Oh, the trouble with the Tories is that they are afflicted with "hogitis."

When there is slop to be drunk they want to do the drinking. They are perfectly willing to accept the services of the doctor when sick, but as soon as they get well they want to take charge of the doctor and prescribe the medicine to be given others. Having recovered, they are no longer humble and meek, desirous of doing the right thing, but want to get back in the saddle and ride, as in the days of old, rough-shod over their less fortunate fellow beings, and proclaim again as their battle song "the simple plan, that they should take who have the power, and they should keep who can."

Now I am going to tell you an anecdote that truly portrays their nature:

Out my way two of my good Irish friends, Pat and Mike, had been bitter enemies, and on more than one occasion had paid their respects to each other in language that the rules of the House will not permit me to use. Pat became sick—desperately ill—and the doctors held out very little hope for his recovery. The priest came to administer the last rites, and among other things told Pat that before he would be spiritually ready to leave that he would have to make up with Mike. After considerable argument Pat agreed that if the priest would bring Mike around that he would apologize and ask his forgiveness. Well, Mike came; and Pat, true to his word, prayed his forgiveness, and the friendship between them was seemingly restored. But just as Mike was leaving Pat said: "Now, look here, Mike, I have apologized and we have made up, and our settlement stands if I die; but, Mike, if I get well"—and there was fire in his eyes and conviction in his voice—"this —— —— —— settlement is all off."

Big business, that came to this administration on bended knees when it was sick nigh unto death, is recovering, and its arrogance is now measured by the degree of its recovery.

THEN CAME THE LIMELIGHT SEEKERS

I know that some of the criticism directed against the policies of the President has been made in good faith by men who honestly differ with him; but, in my opinion, most of the criticism from those in authority has come from those who, chafing under being submerged by real leadership, are croaking night and day in an effort to be restored to the limelight they formerly enjoyed. And may I add that human experience teaches that small men like small frogs croak the loudest? Some of these little tadpoles in the political pond are trying to croak like they were real, honest-to-goodness bullfrogs. It is simply pathetic. When the country was right up against it and no one seemed to know what to do their sterility of constructive ideas and policies was exemplified in their silence. But now, after Mr. Roosevelt has gone a long way toward straightening things out, and has put into effect constructive ideas and plans, these master minds who a year ago were unable to think a single constructive thought, are recovering from their vocal—not mental—paralysis to the point of destructive criticism. The decent thing, to say the least, for them to do is to keep silent unless they have something to offer, and if they do have something constructive to offer let me say again that the decent thing for them to do would be to offer their suggestions in the proper way to those in authority instead of running to their press agent or the first radio station that will give voice to their criticisms. Well, these fellows did not do anything when we were behind the clouds, and now since we are beginning to get out in the sunlight our people will, in my opinion, continue to follow the leader who led them out of the shadows rather than those who are attempting to interfere with his command.

FOLLOW THE LEADER

Every great crisis demands a great leader. As to whether a nation successfully passes a crisis depends in a large measure upon whether or not the crisis develops a great leader. Fortunately for America we have weathered every crisis because during every one of them a man of real leadership has come forth.

The crisis of 1776 brought forth Washington, and through Washington freedom; the crisis of 1828 brought forth Jackson, and through Jackson the rule of the people; the crisis of 1860 brought forth Lincoln, and through Lincoln the preservation of the Union; the crisis of 1917 brought forth Wilson, and through Wilson a greater insight into our responsibility to others; and the crisis of 1932 brought forth Roosevelt, and through him, may it please God, a greater and truer democracy in which the powers of government will be exerted in a greater effort to serve mankind.

Whatever may be the opinion of others, I think that the American people have again chosen wisely in selecting their leader. And having chosen him, the big thing is to follow his leadership.

I know that there are differences of opinion, and further differences may develop, but I further know that the progress begun cannot continue unless we are united behind our leader. It is not necessary to agree with everything the leader does or says any more than it is necessary for the private to agree with every order and command given by the general. But it is necessary for our people to follow the leader, just as it is necessary for the private to follow the general, if we are determined to win the battle. And I know that slackers and traitors among the American people are as scarce as they have been in the glorious history of the American Army.

And I hope every citizen in this great country of ours, however humble he may be, will consider himself an integral part of the great American army that is battling under

Roosevelt to not only bring back prosperity and plenty, but to create conditions that will enable all of our citizens to share more abundantly in the material and spiritual blessings of our country.

CONCLUSION

Those may criticize who will. The record stands for itself and when presented will satisfy the American people. My prediction is that long after the critics have died and been forgotten the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt will live on in the hearts and minds of the American people as a great man and a great leader, and that when the history of this age is finally written his name, like the name of Abou Ben Adhem of old, because he loved his fellow men, will lead all the rest.

The other night in one of the local theaters I heard the new popular song in which Romeo expresses his devotion to his Juliet in language that runs something like this if my memory serves me correctly:

You may not be an angel
Because angels are so few,
But until an angel comes my way
I'll string along with you.

And I want to say to Mr. Roosevelt, if I may be permitted to paraphrase the verse, and in so saying I believe I express not only the sentiment of my people, the Virginians, but the sentiment of the vast majority of the American people:

You may not be a perfect leader
Because perfect leaders are so few,
But until a perfect leader comes my way
I'll string along with you.

INDIAN LIQUOR LAWS

Mr. WERNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 8662) to modify the operation of the Indian liquor laws on lands which were formerly Indian lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the special Indian liquor laws shall not apply to former Indian lands now outside of any existing Indian reservation in any case where the land is no longer held by Indians under trust patents or under any other form of deed or patent which contains restrictions against alienation without the consent of some official of the United States Government: Provided, however, That all lands within the exterior boundaries of an existing or subsequently established Indian reservation shall be subject to all Indian liquor laws now existing or hereafter provided by Congress: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to discontinue or repeal the provisions of the Indian liquor laws which prohibit the sale, gift, barter, exchange, or other disposition of beer, wine, and other liquors to Indians of the classes set forth in the act of January 30, 1897 (29 Stat.L. 506), and section 241, title 25, of the United States Code.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the following: "That all lands within the exterior boundaries of an existing or subsequently established Indian reservation shall be subject to all Indian liquor laws now existing or hereafter provided by Congress: Provided further."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PORTER BROS. & BIFFLE ET AL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Committee on Claims all evidence on file pertaining to the bill H.R. 7279, Private Calendar No. 142, approved May 9, 1934, for the relief of Porter Bros. & Biffle, and certain other citizens.

I will state that the bill has passed the House. There is no minority report. There is some evidence in there that I want, and I understand this is the way to get it.

The SPEAKER. Is there any adverse report?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. There is no adverse report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

QUARTERS FOR CERTAIN GOVERNMENT SERVICES, EL PASO, TEX.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 1731) to make provisions for suitable quarters for certain Government services at El Paso, Tex., and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when the owners of lots 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, portions of lots 16 and 17, block 21, Campbell's Addition, El Paso, Tex. (hereinafter called the owners), have agreed to erect on such lots a building of such design, plan, and specifications as may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury as suitable for the use of the Bureau of Immigration, the Bureau of Customs, the United States Public Health Service, and the Bureau of Plant Quarantine, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to negotiate, and, subject to an appropriation therefor, lease such building and such lots from the owners for a term of 25 years after such building is ready for occupancy at a fair annual rental, subject to the limitations of section 322 of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, approved June 30, 1932. Such lease shall contain provisions—

(1) Giving the Secretary of the Treasury an option on behalf of the United States to purchase such building and such lots from the owners at any time during the term of the lease at a price which shall not exceed the total cost of construction of the building, plus the sum of $22,500 (the value of such lots), and less an allowance for depreciation of such building of not less than 4 percent per annum of the cost of construction computed from the date of readiness for occupancy up to the time of exercising such option.

(2) For a cancelation of the lease in the event that the lots on which the building is to be constructed are determined, judicially or by agreement, to be lands subject to the jurisdiction of the United States of Mexico.

SEC. 2. There is authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to pay the installments of rent provided for in such lease and, in the event the Secretary of the Treasury exercises the option to buy under such lease, to pay the purchase price of such building.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, strike out all of lines 8 to 17, inclusive.

Page 2, line 18, strike out "(2)."

Page 2, line 24, after the word "lease", strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

Branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, praying for the prompt passage of the so-called "Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill", which was ordered to lie on the table.

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT SYSTEM

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask that there be printed in full in the RECORD and lie on the table resolutions of the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, memorializing Congress in favor of legislation providing a retirement system for railroad employees.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Boston.

Resolution memorializing Congress in favor of legislation providing for a retirement system for railroad employees

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby records itself in favor of the enactment by the Congress of the United States of the "Hatfield-Wagner bill", so called, current Senate bill no. 3231, which provides for a retirement system for railroad employees; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forthwith forward copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

In senate, adopted June 7, 1934.

In house of representatives, adopted in concurrence June 8, 1934.

A true copy.

Attest:

[SEAL]

F. W. COOK,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 3772) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Arabella E. Bodkin", approved May 21, 1934, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1410) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 139) to protect the revenue by regulation of the traffic in containers of distilled spirits, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1411) thereon.

Mr. WAGNER, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 3724) to aid in providing the people of the United States with adequate facilities for park, parkway, and recreational area purposes, and to provide for the transfer of certain lands chiefly valuable for such purposes to States and political subdivisions thereof, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1412) thereon.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 2448) providing payment to employees, Bureau of Reclamation, for mileage traveled in privately owned automobiles, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1413) thereon.

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 3333) to provide for the purchase and sale of farm products, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1414) thereon.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, to which was referred the bill (S. 3710) to provide sick leave for certain civilian employees of the United States Government, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H.R. 4554) to amend section 4808 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 24, sec. 3) to prevent discriminatory reductions in pay of the retired personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1415) thereon.

Mr. COOLIDGE, from the Committee on Immigration, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

S. 868. An act to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes;

S. 3769. An act to provide for legalizing the residence in the United States of certain classes of aliens; and

S. 3770. An act to provide adjustment of status of certain aliens lawfully admitted without requirement of departure to foreign country.

Mr. COOLIDGE also, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (S. 3771) to authorize the deportation of the habitual criminal, to guard against the separation from their families of aliens of the noncriminal classes, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BULOW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3522) granting to the State of South Dakota for institutional purposes the property known and designated as the "Canton Asylum", Canton, S.Dak., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1416) thereon.

Mr. HEBERT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1538) authorizing persons, firms, corporations, associations, or societies to file bills of interpleader, or bills in the nature of interpleader, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1417), thereon.

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 235) to employ expert assistance to brief, index, and put in form the testimony taken in certain election cases by select committees, reported it without amendment.

FINANCING OF MAYFLOWER HOTEL CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate Resolution 231, submitted by Mr. GIBSON on May 26, 1934, reported it without additional amendment, and, on motion of Mr. BYRNES, it was considered by unanimous consent.

The resolution was previously reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 6, line 9, after the word "than", to strike out "May 31" and insert "September 30", and at the end of line 16, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$1,000"; so as to make the resolution read:

Whereas it is reported—

1. That the Mayflower Hotel Co. and the Mayflower Hotels Corporation of America were incorporated in or about 1922 to construct and operate the Mayflower Hotel on Connecticut Avenue in Washington, D.C., the title to the property to be in the Mayflower Hotel Co.;

2. That the following securities of said corporations were sold to the public, viz, $7,500,000 of first-mortgage 6-percent bonds; $2,400,000 of second-mortgage 6½-percent bonds; $3,031,100 of 6-percent preferred stock; and 60,000 shares of common stock, amounting in the aggregate, exclusive of the common stock, to $12,931,100;

3. That a foreclosure of said first mortgage is pending, in which a sale of the properties securing the same has been authorized at a minimum price of $2,800,000;

4. That three bondholders' committees have been formed, which have obtained possession and control of about 80 percent of said bonds;

5. That two of said committees are composed of the original sellers of said securities or of their associates and affiliates;

6. That said bondholders' committees have united in a plan of reorganization, by the terms of which—

(a) No provision is made for any securities or stock except the first-mortgage bonds, with the result that under said plan the holders of said second-mortgage bonds, of the preferred stock, and of the common stock would suffer a total loss;

(b) Upon consummation of the plan depositing first-mortgage-bond holders will receive for each $1,000 principal amount of said first-mortgage bonds (with a proportionately smaller amount for $500 and $100 denominations) $500 principal amount of new 15-year 4½-percent general-mortgage sinking-fund bonds, together with 10 shares of capital stock, making a maximum total of $3,721,500 principal amount of new bonds and the entire outstanding capital stock of the proposed new company (74,430 shares authorized);

(c) Said $3,721,500 mortgage will not be a first lien, but will be second to a mortgage estimated to be for not less than $500,000 nor more than $750,000, the giving of which $500,000 to $750,000 mortgage is claimed to be wholly unnecessary in view of the cash on hand, and of the ability to raise any small deficiency on short-term unsecured notes, or, if necessary, on pledging a sufficient amount of the first-lien mortgage bonds;

(d) The 74,430 shares of stock of the new company proposed by the reorganization committee will be issued to a voting trust committee consisting of three members, who will hold the stock for 2 years, subject to an extension of 6 years, making the voting trust period provided for 8 years altogether, the 6-year extension being subject to the authorization of a majority in interest of the voting-trust-certificate holders;

(e) Provision is made for a reorganization committee of three members, each to be paid $7,500 a year; of a voting trust committee of three members; and for the designation of a bank to supervise the financial affairs of the new company;

(f) The reorganization committee is given authority to bid in the hotel property or to refrain from purchasing it, in their discretion; and if they do bid the property in at the minimum price of $2,800,000, they propose to penalize nondepositing bondholders by settling with them on the basis of such price, whereas the depositing bondholders are to be paid on the basis of $3,721,500 (nearly $1,000,000 more);

(g) The voting trustees shall have full power, if the hotel property is bid in, to sell it and to act as fully as the stockholders themselves might act in regard to any company matters, including the designation of their successors;

(h) The three bondholders' committees shall be paid an aggregate of $62,000 for services;

(i) The bondholding committees with whom bonds have been deposited shall be paid fees and expenses and the charges of their counsel; and there shall be paid the expenses of organization of the new company and of the issuance of its securities and of the first-mortgage loan.

7. That there has accumulated and is on hand from the hotel operations the sum of about $900,000;

8. That it is feared because of the experience of a similar local reorganization, managed, it is asserted by the same persons or some of them, now composing two of the present bondholders' committees, or their affiliates or associates, that the new stockholders' bonds will not sell for more than 20 cents on the dollar, if said reorganization plan is carried out, which would result in a property on which securities were sold for $12,931,100, aside from the common stock, realizing for the security purchasers but $700,000: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That for the purpose of providing the Senate with information to serve as a basis for such legislation, if any, as may in its judgment be found necessary in respect of financing the construction of buildings, selling to the public of bonds secured by mortgages on such buildings and the land they cover, and of preferred and common stock of the corporate owners of such real estate, and to correct abuses in such financing, and to protect the public against losses from unsound financing, and in particular to protect such investors as have already suffered losses in this Mayflower Hotel financing and such as are threatened with further and future losses in connection with the proposed reorganization of said Mayflower Hotel corporations and properties the Committee on the District of Columbia, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is directed to investigate all facts in connection with the financing and the proposed reorganization of said hotel and in particular the following matters relating to said corporations and to said proposed reorganization, viz:

(a) Who sold and what methods were pursued to accomplish the sale of $7,500,000 of first-mortgage 6-percent bonds; of $2,400,000 second-mortgage 6½-percent mortgage bonds; of $3,031,100 of 6-percent preferred stock; and 60,000 shares of common stock, all securities of said corporations, and aside from the common stock amounting in the aggregate to $12,931,100.

(b) As to the management of said corporations since their formation in or about 1925 to date.

(c) As to the circumstances which have led up to the fixing, in proceedings for foreclosure of the first mortgage, of $2,800,000 as a price which the Mayflower properties may be sold, on which securities to the amount of $12,931,100 were sold to the public.

(d) Whether the sellers of such securities for $12,931,100 are the same persons, or some of them, who have now obtained control of said securities as members of bondholders' committees of said first-mortgage bonds and the methods used to obtain such control, and to induce the bondholders to whom they sold such bonds to deposit the same with them as reorganizers, and specifically to determine if said sellers of securities and the members of said bondholders' committees are now advocating the sale of said hotel property for $2,800,000, a sum approximately one-fourth the amount of the securities issued against the same.

(e) Whether the proposed reorganization is in the interest of the security holders.

The committee or subcommittee shall make a final report of its investigation, with recommendations, to the Senate, not later than September 30, 1934. For the purposes of this resolution the committee or subcommittee is authorized to avail itself of the services of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and of the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and to make expenditures to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee. The total of such expenditures shall not exceed $1,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO EMERGENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LOGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9830, the first deficiency and emergency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Add to the first paragraph of title II of the bill, on page 63, after line 19, the following additional proviso:

"Provided further, That in order to meet the emergency in the maintenance of schools of less than college grade in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, there is hereby appropriated and made available out of any funds heretofore or herein appropriated for carrying out the purposes of the Federal Emergency Relief Act of 1933, the sum of $75,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, as an emergency measure solely. The funds hereby appropriated for schools shall be allocated and disbursed on the basis of need to the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia by the Federal Emergency Relief Administrator in cooperation with and upon the advice of the United States Commissioner of Education. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the distribution of funds, upon application, to privately supported free-tuition schools in need. Nor shall anything in this act be construed to empower any Federal officer to control the instruction or administration in education in any State."

UTILIZATION OF WASTE SLASH PINE

Mr. HATFIELD submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 270), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the public press has directed attention to the possible development of a new and profitable industry to be developed through the utilization of practically waste slash-pine lands of several States; and

Whereas such an industry, if developed, would provide profitable employment opportunities for thousands now unemployed, and would make possible the savings of many millions of dollars yearly to consumers; and

Whereas there is grave danger that this development may be set aside owing to the opposition of some certain persons now holding responsible Government positions: Be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and comprehensive study of the possibilities of developing industries with the use of slash pine; and in making this study such committee is authorized to confer with such other Government departments and agencies as it deems advisable. The committee shall report its findings to the Senate not later than February 1, 1935, together with its recommendations for necessary Federal legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4460) to provide for the payment of compensation to George E. Q. Johnson.

The message also announced that the House had severally agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills of the House:

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H.R. 8662) to modify the operation of the Indian liquor laws on lands which were formerly Indian lands was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE REVIEW OF PRESENT SESSION OF CONGRESS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on June 12, 1934, under the auspices of the National Radio Forum. In this address the Senator from Arkansas reviews in an able and interesting manner the remarkable achievements of the present session of the Congress.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LEGISLATIVE REVIEW OF THE PRESENT SESSION OF THE CONGRESS

National economic recovery is the general subject toward which legislative efforts have been directed during the present session of the Congress. Ultraconservatives have from time to time asserted that some of the policies of the Roosevelt administration are so radical and have been so hastily formulated as to delay the restoration of confidence and the revival of business. Prophets of evil have not witnessed confirmation of their foreboding. On the contrary, conditions throughout the country appear to be steadily improving, although, as might be expected, there still are enough difficulties and dangers ahead to require the continued cooperation of all lovers of our country.

While the date for adjournment has not yet been fixed, it is likely that the Congress will soon suspend its work, leaving undisposed of a number of measures which were added to the program, some of them a few weeks, others only a few days, ago.

The purpose of this address is to review the important accomplishments which are to be credited to the National Legislature under the leadership of the President since it met on January 3, 1934. If no additional laws should be enacted between now and adjournment, it may be truthfully stated that the present session will be memorable for both the number and the importance of the subject matter dealt with. My hearers will readily understand that the time limit of this address prevents even a complete summary of what has been done.

If your speaker is able to refer to those reforms which are believed to supplement the plans made during last year's extraordinary session and to make brief mention of an additional number of new laws which move forward the forces fighting for recovery against depression on the long front so that those interested may have a comprehensive picture of the struggle, he believes a helpful purpose will have been accomplished by his remarks.

ROOSEVELT MONETARY POLICY

When President Roosevelt was inaugurated, the country was not only confronted with a threatened breakdown of all credit organizations but, due to depreciated foreign currencies, our domestic producers and merchants were at great disadvantage in carrying on foreign commerce. The Roosevelt policies comprehended not only the creation of increased purchasing power and the reduction of unemployment; it also included the revival of foreign trade as essential to the restoration of prosperity.

The silver bill supplements the act passed in the early part of the present session authorizing the nationalization of monetary gold, the reduction of the gold content of our dollar, and the use of a large fund in connection with international exchange. The Silver Act gives the President authority to nationalize silver and to purchase a sufficient amount of it to provide a metallic reserve for one-fourth of our currency. It is expected not only to strengthen purchasing power among our people but also among those whose monetary systems rest upon the white metal, thus lending aid to arrangements for the disposition of our surplus farm and manufactured products. The soundness of the monetary policy has been demonstrated. If it has not produced all the results looked for by its proponents, its application certainly has not been attended by the evil forecast by its opponents.

VETERAN ALLOWANCES

There were inserted in the independent offices appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1935 amendments restoring to the rolls a large number of veterans whose allowances had been discontinued under the authority conferred upon the President in the Economy Act. Other amendments were also incorporated increasing allowances that had been reduced. The President vetoed the bill, and it was passed over his veto.

RECIPROCAL TARIFFS

The bill permitting the President to enter into reciprocal tariff agreements was hotly contested in both the House and the Senate, principally on the ground that it was alleged to constitute an unwarranted delegation of the treaty and the law-making powers. The constitutionality of the law is fortified by numerous legislative and judicial precedents. In almost every period of our country's history since 1794 the Congress from time to time has empowered the President as its agent to impose and remove restrictions on international trade and shipping for the protection of American interests against unfavorable policies pursued by foreign competitors. There is nothing new in the legislation, and there is no ground for fear that the power will be abused. Our foreign commerce has dwindled alarmingly during the last few years. While other governments have taken advantage of the opportunity to enter into reciprocal arrangements respecting tariffs, tonnage, and port facilities, the United States has invited retaliation and detrimental measures on the part of other nations through the imposition of prohibitory duties and through the erection of unnecessarily high tariff walls.

Under this policy American merchants and carriers in the foreign trade have been brought face to face with the ruin of their ventures. Under that policy our commerce has diminished more rapidly than the commerce of our competitors. The Reciprocal Tariff Act comes late, but it is hoped and believed not too late to give opportunity for arrangements of mutual benefit—arrangements through which we may buy from others what we cannot economically provide for ourselves and in return sell to them the surpluses for which we can develop no domestic market.
